Paul Finkelman

The Appeasement of 1850

The Compromise of 1850 has always been seen as a classic moment of American political history. Historians wax eloquent about the brilliance of the debate, the selfless dedication to the Union of some of the participants, and particularly the heroic role of Henry Clay in coming out of retirement to craft a compromise in 1850, as he had done in 1820. The traditional works also acknowledge the other “heroic” men of the age who worked with Clay, especially Daniel Webster and John C. Calhoun. Thus the historian Robert Remini has argued in his recent book on the compromise that “once the great men of the antebellum era passed away—men such as Andrew Jackson, Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, and John C. Calhoun—the nation lacked individuals in positions of power who were passionately devoted to the Union.” Remini argues that the crisis of 1850 was averted “because there were a number of men in Congress who were willing to compromise—and not simply on one issue, like slavery, but on many related issues that divided North and South, such as congressional control over the territories, the admission of California, the New Mexico boundary, and the Texas debt.”

This heroic analysis of the compromise is problematic. Remini argues that the Compromise of 1850 prevented the American Union from being “irreparably smashed” and says the compromise “is a prime example of how close this nation came to a catastrophic smash-up” and that his heroes in Congress “avoided that disaster, averted its consequences, and hundreds of thousands may have been saved in the billions of dollars. And when the Civil War began, but not until then, the nation as we mark the war’s sesquicentennial. It was the compromise that the Union and its leaders, he then retreats to the fact that the South was that it gave the North ten years to enable it to overpower the South was that it was in this decade that the nation was saved.” Remini further claims that the compromise leaders who could save the Union.

These arguments are, in the phrase of the “passionately devoted to the Union,” that Jackson’s administration over nullification was expendable. He opposed and defeated the constitutionality and the Supreme Court. He believed that secession was always on the table. Southern senators like Clay, the Houston of Texas believed secession was a possibility for slave owners who despised abolitionists. The Union. Similarly, northerners like Salmon P. Chase of Ohio and Hannibal Hamlin of Maine were also passionately devoted to the Union because it was overwhelmingly pro-Union and campaign for secession. But the heroism of John C. Calhoun, like Henry C. Corbin of South Carolina, James M. Mason of Virginia, and Florida, were still talking about secession. They won almost everything they wanted in the compromise of 1850, but it was not enough.}

---

1Robert Remini, At the Edge of the Precipice: Henry Clay and the Compromise That Saved the Union (New York, 2010), pp. xi–xii.

2Ibid., p. xi.

3Ibid., pp. xiii, 158.
always been seen as a classic moment when historians wax eloquent about the brilliant role of Henry Clay in coming out of 1850, as he had done in 1820. The other "heroic" men of the age who were Daniel Webster, and John C. Calhoun. Thus Remini in his recent book on the compromise era passed away—men of power who were passionately that the crisis of 1850 was averted by Congress who were willing to compromise—"bargaining," but on many related issues as congressional control over the New Mexico boundary, and the...[Image 0x0 to 612x792]

Congress "avoided that disaster—just in time." But of course, the catastrophic smash-up in fact occurred anyway, with a cost of 625,000 or so lives and hundreds of thousands more wounded and damaged, and property costs in the billions of dollars. The Union was not "irreparably smashed" when the Civil War began, but the legacy of that conflict still haunts the nation as we mark the war's sesquicentennial. Remini implicitly concedes that the compromise was in the end a failure, and having praised Congress and its leaders, he then retreats to saying the real success of the compromise was that it "gave the North ten years to build its industrial strength and enable it to overpower the South when the war finally broke out." He asserts that it was in this decade that the North expanded its industrial capacity but that when the war began the South "did not have a railroad system by which to move men and material to the areas where they were most needed." He further claims that the compromise also gave the North "ten years to find a leader who could save the Union."3

These arguments are, in the end, not persuasive. Remini's list of men "passionately devoted to the Union" includes John C. Calhoun, who left Jackson's administration over nullification and in 1850 asserted that the Union was expendable. He opposed any compromise and had a long record of defending the constitutionality and the expediency of secession. A true Unionist believed that secession was always unconstitutional and unacceptable. In 1850 Southern senators like Clay, Thomas Hart Benton of Missouri, and Sam Houston of Texas believed secession could never be on the table. They were slave owners who despised abolitionists, but they did not believe in breaking up the Union. Similarly, northern senators like William Henry Seward of New York, Salmon P. Chase of Ohio, John P. Hale of New Hampshire, and Hannibal Hamlin of Maine were passionately opposed to slavery but were also passionately devoted to the Union. They opposed the compromise because it was overwhelmingly proslavery, but they did not return to the North and campaign for secession. But southern Senators who had been acolytes of John C. Calhoun, like Henry S. Foote of Mississippi, R. Barnwell Rhett of South Carolina, James M. Mason of Virginia, and David Levy Yulee of Florida, were still talking about secession after the compromise, even though they won almost everything they wanted in the compromise. Rather than stifle secessionist talk, the compromise emboldened southern nationalists to push for more concessions for slavery, while also stimulating them to push their disunion agenda.

3Ibid., p. xi.
4Ibid., pp. xiii, 158.

The final compromise was, as I argue below, overwhelmingly proslavery. It was an appeasement of the most radical proslavery men, and gave virtually nothing to the North or to freedom. But in its wake no northern political leaders suggested secession. The only politicians considering secession after the compromise were southern followers of the late John C. Calhoun, who were decidedly not passionately devoted to the Union. In the North the only secessionist claims came from a small band of radical abolitionists who followed William Lloyd Garrison, and they did not even vote or participate in politics.\footnote{Elsewhere I have argued that the Garrisonian disunionist position was sensible because the U.S. Constitution was proslavery and precluded a democratic response to slavery. The Garrisonians, of course, could not anticipate that the end to slavery would come through a war started by the slaveholders themselves. See Paul Finkelman, “The Founders and Slavery: Little Ventured, Little Gained,” Yale Journal of Law and the Humanities 13 (2000):413–49.}

By any measure, the Compromise of 1850 failed to achieve its major goal—to defuse sectional conflict over slavery. The compromise stimulated a decade of confrontations between northerners and the federal government over the fugitive slave law and even led to states’ rights arguments by northern public officials in opposition to that law.\footnote{The most famous example took place in Wisconsin, where the state supreme court declared the federal law unconstitutional. See In re Booth and Rycoft, 3 Wis. 157 (1854), which was overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court in Ableman v. Booth, 62 U.S. (3 How.) 506 (1859). For a history of this case, see H. Robert Baker, The Rescue of Joshua Glover: A Fugitive Slave, the Constitution, and the Coming of the Civil War (Athens, Ohio, 2006).} The compromise also failed to settle the issue of slavery in the territories. In 1854 Congress revisited the issue, passing the Kansas-Nebraska Act, which led to a mini–civil war in Kansas and the creation of the first nationally viable antislavery political organization, the Republican Party. The Supreme Court then weighed in on the issue in Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857). The presidential elections of 1856 and 1860 were mostly about the issues that the Compromise of 1850 supposedly settled.

Despite Remini’s claim that there were many issues troubling Congress, there was, with one minor exception, just a single issue: slavery. Southerners objected to California’s admission because it was entering the Union as a free state; northerners worried about the regulation of the territories because Henry Clay wanted to allow slavery in all of them. The New Mexico boundary was an issue because not actually enter the Union as a free state. Texas would only increase the land. Texas debt—the easiest and least was not directly connected to slavery. Heroic analysis of the compromise—the Fuglist note that by settling the territories created the Compromise of 1850 decades earlier.

The argument of Remini and the time for the North to become secession is tantamount to understand that the compromise was a future war. It was designed to make sense it failed. But even if we accept the consequence of the compromise was to block the North. Economic data suggests the growth the South actually exceeded.

The North was clearly more and in 1860, but by 1860 the South “underwent remarkable transformation, began committing more more resources resulted.” For example, between the Pennsylvania and New Jersey were even greater expansions in um, it grew by just 20 percent. Many growth rates. In Georgia and Alabama, South Carolina, Virginia, North Carolina and Florida topped them both.

boundary was an issue because northerners hoped the territory would eventually enter the Union as a free state, and thus giving substantial parts of it to Texas would only increase the land controlled by the slave power. Only the Texas debt—the easiest and least controversial aspect of the compromise—was not directly connected to slavery. Remini's summary of the issues in his heroic analysis of the compromise oddly ignores the single most divisive aspect of the compromise—the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850. Nor does his short list note that by settling the territorial issue as it did, Congress actually eviscerated the Compromise of 1820, which Clay had brilliantly crafted three decades earlier.

The argument of Remini and other scholars that the compromise bought time for the North to become stronger is also problematic. First, it is important to understand that the compromise was not designed to buy time to prepare for a future war. It was designed to avoid secession and war, and in that sense it failed. But even if we accept the argument that an unintended consequence of the compromise was to buy time, it is not clear whether that favored the North. Economic data suggests just the opposite: that the rate of industrial growth in the South actually exceeded that in the North during this period.

The North was clearly more industrialized than the South both in 1850 and in 1860, but by 1860 the South was catching up. Southern railroads “underwent remarkable transformations in the 1850s.” In that decade “southerners began committing more money to railroads and an explosion of mileage resulted.” For example, between 1850 and 1860 railroad mileage doubled in Pennsylvania and New Jersey and nearly doubled in New York. There were even greater expansions in the Midwest. On the other hand, in New Hampshire railroad mileage grew by only 50 percent, and in Massachusetts it grew by just 20 percent. Many southern states more than matched these growth rates. In Georgia mileage more than doubled; it more than tripled in Alabama, South Carolina, Virginia, and North Carolina; and in Louisiana it more than quadrupled. But these rates were dwarfed in other slave states. While Ohio’s railroad mileage grew by about 500 percent, neighbor Kentucky’s mileage grew by over 700 percent. Indiana’s tracks increased by about 900 percent, but Mississippi topped that with nearly a 1,200 percent growth and Florida topped them both with a 1,900 percent growth. Illinois’s mileage grew by about 2,500 percent. Wisconsin topped the North with a 4,525 percent growth, but Tennessee easily beat both with a 13,922 percent growth rate. Three slave states (Arkansas, Missouri, and Texas) had no railroads in 1850 but more than 1,150 miles in 1860, while only two northern states (California and Iowa) had no miles in 1850, but they still had only 688 miles in 1860. These figures demonstrate that Remini’s arguments about the compromise buying time for the North to increase its railroad capacity are simply wrong. If anything, the compromise gave the South more time to build up its railroads, which it used effectively in the war.

The percentage growth of southern railroads in the 1850s should not be misunderstood. Because of the low starting base, the percentage growth is exaggerated. Tennessee, for example, had only 9 miles of railroads in 1850, so its percentage increase is huge (about 14,000 percent). But its absolute mileage growth of 1,244 miles in the decade was greater than all but four northern states. So too was Virginia’s expansion from 481 miles to 1,731 miles. The point here is not that the South was suddenly the industrial equal of the North, but rather that the South’s “extraordinary expansion during the 1850s” severely undermines the notion that the industrial growth between the compromise and the Civil War favored the North.

Railroad receipts underscore the closing gap between the sections. They illustrate not only the growth of railroads but also the growth of commerce and other industrial development in the South. In New England receipts doubled from 1849 to 1859, and in the Middle Atlantic they tripled. But in the South they quadrupled, and in the Southwest they were eighteen times larger in 1859 than in 1849. As with the growth in tracks, the percentage growth in revenue is skewed by low starting bases. But the absolute growth is significant. The Central Railroad of Georgia earned over $269,000 in 1850 from its upfreight operations (freight carried into or across the state). In 1860 this figure was over $637,000. Downfreight usually accounted for even more earnings. Upfreight revenue on the Charlotte and South Carolina Railroad went from over $11,000 in 1851 to over $156,000 in 1858. Other southern railroads recorded similar growth.

---

7 Aaron W. Marks, Railroads in the Old South: Pursuing Progress in a Slave Society (Baltimore, 2009), p. 5.
8 Ibid., pp. 5–6.
9 Ibid., p. 4.
10 Ibid., pp. 117, 123. For other railroads, see pp. 115–25.

Railroad mileage and railroad receipts illustrate the growing industrialization of the South and dramatic southern growth under the Compromise of 1850. But Remini is simply wrong in stating that the South was industrially backward by 1860. On the contrary, catching up with the North, and eventually surpassing it, the South may have been better off in the end.

Remini’s argument about leadership must be evaluated in another light. The single most important leadership figure of the 1850s was not a Southern statesman, but a young Stephen A. Douglas, who risked his career to save the Union. The statesman whom Remini suggests as the key Southern leader of the 1850s, Andrew Jackson, was long dead by 1850, and a military leader standing up for the Union, such as Benjamin H. Key or J. Hart Benton in the federal government, was absent. Although Jackson’s performance during the War of 1812 was impressive, his actions in the 1840s were less so. Nor can we imagine a more successful military leader of the 1850s than Zachary Taylor, who died in 1850. The 1850s were a time of partisanship and sectionalism, with sectional conflict the norm. It is equally important to understand that the success of the Compromise of 1850 should not be underestimated. A continuation of the sectional politics of the 1840s and 1850s would have led to a civil war. A new political settlement was necessary, and the Compromise of 1850 is a testament to the wisdom of the Framers of the Constitution.

Indeed, we might easily turn back the clock of time and imagine a 1850s South that continued the industrial growth and economic development of the 1840s and 1850s, and that was able to compete with the North in terms of industrial output and economic development. Such a South might have avoided the Civil War and the subsequent economic depression that followed. But such a South never existed. The Compromise of 1850 is a testament to the智慧 of the Framers of the Constitution and the wisdom of their political settlement.

---

Railroad mileage and railroad receipts are crude measures, but they illustrate the growing industrialization of the South in the 1850s. The more dramatic southern growth underscores the general low level of industrialization in the South before 1850. But this dramatic growth shows that Remini is simply wrong in stating that the compromise allowed the North to gain an industrial advantage by 1860. On the contrary, in the 1850s the South was catching up with the North, and thus relative to where it was in 1850, the South may have been better off in 1860.

Remini's argument about leadership is of course utterly impossible to prove or disprove. We can never know if a leader might have emerged in the early 1850s to oppose southern secession, if it had occurred then. We might imagine a young Stephen A. Douglas leading the North in 1852 in fighting to preserve the Union. The staunchly Unionist Sam Houston, a nationally known heroic figure, might also have been the leader of the moment. Like Andrew Jackson in the 1830s, he would have been a southern slaveholder and a military leader standing up to southern hotheads. Missouri's Thomas Hart Benton had similar stature as a staunch slaveholding southern Unionist, although without the military experience of Houston or Jackson.

It is equally important to understand that there is also no way to know if any southern states would have in fact seceded in 1850 if a substantially different set of laws had been passed. There were some secessionist sentiments bandied about in 1850, but two secessionist conventions that year were comical failures. One took place and then collapsed before the compromise was passed; the other met and failed after the compromise had passed. The compromise surely undermined the second secessionist convention, but we cannot know if a more reasonable and less one-sided compromise would not have worked just as well. Moreover, as David Potter points out in his Pulitzer Prize–winning study of the decade, “widespread prosperity” and high cotton prices also undermined the secessionists. Potter notes, “There was too much sentiment for a secession movement to take root.”

Indeed, we might easily turn Remini's argument on its head. The Compromise of 1850 bought time for the secessionists to gather support, encourage southern industrial growth, and find leadership. The death of Calhoun left the secessionists and extreme southern nationalists grooping for a leader.

---

Not till well after the compromise did Jefferson Davis emerge as a logical successor to Calhoun. Meanwhile, it took a decade under the utterly pro-slavery compromise for southern nationalists to gain strength and foster hostility to the Union. They could do this because the compromise was so one-sided that it emboldened southern nationalists to make new demands for more concessions to slavery, while the outrageous fugitive slave law led to open northern hostility, which in turn played into the hands of the southern nationalists.

It was during this decade that southerners also seriously began to create their own institutions, ones that would support a southern nation. Georgia’s chief justice Joseph Henry Lumpkin teamed up with his son-in-law, Thomas R. R. Cobb, to create the Lumpkin Law School, to teach southern men how to practice a “southern” version of law. At the end of the decade Cobb published his treatise on the law of slavery—the first ever written by a southerner. Southern defenses of slavery proliferated on the heels of the compromise, while in the 1850s southern leaders pushed for an expansion of education throughout the South, reflecting James DeBow’s assertions that southerners should “cherish and give preference to our own institutions of learning and native instructors.” DeBow argued that “life, habits, thoughts, and aims are so essentially different” in the South “that here a different character of books, tuition, and training is absolutely required, to bring up the boy to manhood with his faculties fully developed.” These of course would be “faculties” that reflected southern values and ideology. As an 1856 convention in Savannah noted, sending southern children north for an education was “fraught with peril to our sacred interests.”

After the compromise was passed, “military education” in the South “took on a more serious aspect,” as traditional schools, like LaGrange College, were turned into military schools and Virginia put more resources into Virginia Military Institute. During the 1850s private military companies proliferated in the South, with state governors urging greater attention to military training. By the mid-1850s “anxieties of some citizens of the upper South regarding their militia bordered on hysteria.”

The growth of militia companies, while others formed with the literature of the South. Thus, just as the South used its railroad infrastructure, the South and military preparedness.

Fresh from their victory in slavery, except California, the southern states to the Kansas-Nebraska Act, in 1857. These events finally led to the split of the Democratic Party, the first political force in the South. To the endless demands of the Southern secessionists, as southern states that the Republicans were about. Fugitive Slave Law of 1850 outstripped American values of justice, the Constitution to the law infuriated southerners. Each side demanded more, fostering northern resistance to the compromise. Laws and decisions also played in the growth of rhetoric for their side. This might have happened.

The Crisis

The crisis that faced the nation was not terribly complicated. In 1856, of Congress tried to ban slavery in the District of Columbia. The first attempt to do this the Wilmot Proviso was introduced to by the North. The proviso passed the House, but the South had a majority until late 1856.

---

Jefferson Davis emerge as a logical conclusion to a decade under the utterly pro-nationalist to gain strength and foster this because the compromise was so southern nationalists to make new demands on the outrageous fugitive slave law led played into the hands of the southerners also seriously began to create support a southern nation. Georgia's named up with his son-in-law, Thomas Cobb Law School, to teach southern men law. At the end of the decade Cobb ere—the first ever written by a south-obfervated on the heels of the compropushed for an expansion of education DeBow's assertions that southerners tion of learning and native inst-its, thoughts, and aims are so essential, different character of books, tuition, ing up the boy to manhood with his verse would be "faculties" that reflected 356 convention in Savannah noted, education was "fraught with peril to military education" in the South "took schools, like LaGrange College, were nia put more resources into Virginia itive military companies proliferated faster attention to military training, izens of the upper South regarding

The Crisis

The crisis that faced the nation in 1850 had a number of components but was not terribly complicated. During the Mexican War northern members of Congress tried to ban slavery from any territory acquired from the con-ict. The first attempt to do this was an amendment to an appropriations bill known as the Wilmot Proviso, after Pennsylvania Congressman David Wilmot. The proviso passed the House but failed in the Senate, where the South had a majority until late 1848 and afterward could always find a few

---

13 Franklin, Militant South, pp. 188–89.
northern Democrats to vote against the proviso. After the war the United States acquired a huge land mass, comprising all of present-day California, Utah, and Nevada, most of Arizona and New Mexico, and parts of Colorado, Wyoming, and Texas. In addition—and this is ignored by most historians of the war—the peace treaty also settled the border of Texas by ceding huge amounts of what is now West Texas and South Texas to the United States. At the time of Texas independence (1836) the southern and western boundary of the Mexican state of Tejas was the Nueces River. Thus the war also settled the ownership of portions of what is today western Texas and eastern New Mexico.\textsuperscript{15} Immediately after the war the entire nation recognized that the land south of the Nueces River to the Rio Grande—what is today South Texas—belonged to Texas. But the land west of the Nueces—some fifty thousand square miles—was clearly not part of Texas. As the leading history of Texas notes, “the Nueces was traditionally viewed as the western boundary of Texas.”\textsuperscript{17} When Texas entered the Union, neither Texas nor the United States had actually defined the western boundary of the state, and the resolution of annexation merely said that “all questions of boundary that may arise with other governments” would be “subject to the adjustment by this government.”\textsuperscript{18} This covered the contingency of diplomacy with Mexico to settle where the western boundary of the United States ended and Mexico began. But this provision did not anticipate the acquisition of all the territory from the Nueces River to the Pacific Ocean.

Thus, with the exception of the Rio Grande valley, in South Texas, the question for Congress—and the nation—was how to organize these territories. About half the land was north of the Missouri Compromise line (36°30’N). One option was to simply extend the line across the rest of the nation, opening up present-day New Mexico, Arizona, and southern California to slavery and leaving northern California, Utah, Nevada, and Colorado free. Northerners rejected this because they did not want any new slave states; southerners opposed this step to all the new federal territories. The gold rush brought about one humorous ad: California eligible for immediate statehood; New Mexico eligible for immediate statehood; New Mexico eligible for immediate statehood. The admission to the Union as a free state of the new territories were the idea of New Mexico be ceded to that state, thus, nor had Texans actually settler desert and railroad.

The territorial issue virtually disappeared until the 1840s. As settlers poured in, passing legislation to provide a way to organize territories (1846) and Wisconsin (1848) entered the Union. In the meantime, New Mexico had enough settlers to get organized, but territorial question festered, other than bedeviled Congress.

Beyond the territorial issue, there was another that would become a central focus of politics in the 1840s—slavery. Three involved the debt of Texas, and the need for a new independent republic. When it entered the Union, Texas had an extensive debt. Texans argued, with some justification, that the federal government should bail out the state. One plan was to shift this matter in favor of Texas. It involved making slavery in every state in the Union except the former territories of Texas and New Mexico.

15Most maps of the Mexican Cession exclude eastern New Mexico and West and South Texas, but all this land was also ceded to the United States as a result of the treaty. One might argue that Texas was also ceded, since Mexico had never recognized Texas independence, but that argument would not make much sense since all of Texas north and east of the Nueces River was in fact incorporated into the United States in 1845. The United States did not, however, have any political control or even military control over the territory west and south of the Nueces until the war.

17Ibid., p. 129.
the proviso. After the war the United praising all of present-day California, and New Mexico, and parts of Colo-dan—and this is ignored by most histosettled the border of Texas by ceding Texas and South Texas to the United since (1836) the southern and western was the Nueces River. Thus the war of what is today western Texas and after the war the entire nation recog-Nueces River to the Rio Grande—what is But the land west of the Nueces—clearly not part of Texas. As the lead-as traditionally viewed as the western entered the Union, neither Texas nor the western boundary of the state, y said that “all questions of bound-ents” would be “subject to the adjust-ted the contingency of diplomacy ern boundary of the United States mission did not anticipate the acquisi-River to the Pacific Ocean.
Grande valley, in South Texas, the —was how to organize these territde the Missouri Compromise line end the line across the rest of the co, Arizona, and southern Calinia, Utah, Nevada, and Colo-experience they did not want any new slave states; southerners opposed this solution because they wanted to spread slavery to all the new federal territories. While this issue festered, the California gold rush brought about one hundred thousand settlers there, making California eligible for immediate statehood. With fewer than a thousand blacks in California—most of whom were not slaves—the settlers there demanded admission to the Union as a free state. Further complicating the organization of the new territories were the increasing demands from Texas that most of New Mexico be ceded to that state. There was no historical or legal basis for this, nor had Texans actually settled the area, which was mostly scrubland and desert.

The territorial issue virtually paralyzed Congress in the last three years of the 1840s. As settlers poured into California, Congress was incapable of passing legislation to provide a working government for the territory. Iowa (1846) and Wisconsin (1848) entered the Union, but Congress could not pass laws to organize the new territories, even though by 1849 both California and New Mexico had enough settlers to justify statehood. Meanwhile, as the territorial question festered, other issues, mostly connected to slavery, further bedeviled Congress.

Beyond the territorial question were three other issues, one of which would become a central focus of political debate in the 1850s. The easiest of the three involved the debt of Texas. From 1836 to 1845 Texas had been an independent republic. When it entered the Union, in 1845, Texas was deeply in debt. Texans argued, with some justice, that the national government should bail out the state. One piece of the Compromise of 1850 would settle this matter in favor of Texas. Less easy to settle were two issues related to slavery. Northerners wanted to end slavery in the District of Columbia. More realistically, they wanted to end the public sale of slaves in the District of Columbia. This would not harm slavery or the system of slavery but merely end the embarrassment of having slaves marched through the national capital in chains or publicly auctioned off in the shadow of the White House and Congress. Northerners were deeply offended by this (as were some diplomats), but everyone understood that the ban was merely symbolic, since slave owners in the district could easily take their slaves to Virginia for sale, or sell them privately. Southerners almost universally opposed ending

---

19 For a discussion of these issues see Paul Finkelman and Donald R. Kennon, eds., In the Shadow of Freedom: The Politics of Slavery in the National Capital (Athens, Ohio, 2011).
the trade, not because it would affect the system of slavery—because it clearly would not—but as a matter of proslavery principles. Ending the D.C. slave trade would be an admission that buying and selling slaves was morally wrong—which southerners would not admit, and most did not believe.

While northerners wanted to end the slave trade in the district, southerners had a more practical demand, although one that was deeply symbolic as well. They wanted a new fugitive slave law that would require the federal government to become involved in the process of capturing runaway slaves and returning them to the South. The practical value of this was obvious, since there were perhaps ten thousand or more fugitive slaves in the North (and more escaping every year) worth millions of dollars. Southerners wanted this property returned to them. Since northern states refused to cooperate in hunting runaway slaves, southerners wanted the national government to do the job. In the face of growing northern noncooperation on the return of fugitive slaves, southerners also wanted an emphatic reaffirmation by Congress of their right to recover their runaways and that the federal government supported that right.

With these issues festering, General Zachary Taylor, who had spent almost his entire adult life in the military, was elected president. In March 1849 he took office. The following December the new Congress met, hoping to finally settle the issues of the moment. One of the newest members of Congress, and thus one with no seniority, was in fact the most senior politician in the nation, Senator Henry Clay of Kentucky. Clay was first elected to the Senate in 1806, when he was a few months shy of the constitutionally required age of thirty to sit in that body. Since then Clay had been in the House or Senate for most of his life. He was in the Senate in 1806–7, 1810–11, and continuously from 1831 to 1842. He also served in the House of Representatives from 1811 to 1821 and 1823 to 1825. Six times he was elected Speaker of the House of Representatives. It was from that post in 1819–20 that he guided the Missouri Compromise through Congress. This was his greatest accomplishment. The Missouri Compromise had allowed for sectional peace over slavery in the territories for three decades. Had there been no war with Mexico the compromise might have continued to hold up, and the whole conflict over slavery in the territories could have been avoided. After his successful negotiation of the Missouri Compromise, Clay ran for president in 1824 but lost. He then served as secretary of state under John Quincy Adams. He ran unsuccessfully for president in 1832 and again in 1844. In 1848 he expected to run for the high office to the hero of the Mexican-American War election. With this career of fame, Clay returned to the Senate in 1850.

Clay’s Return to the Senate

The seventy-two-year-old junior senator was back in the Senate after an absence of seven years, realizing the presidency. In 1844 he had won about five thousand votes. Had Clay been a Whig, or even a Southern Democrat, he would have been the nominee. Clay and other Whigs had supported Filmore, who lost the New York convention. If the anti-slavery party had been more realistic and even footed, Clay would have been the party’s choice. Clay’s... the system of slavery—because it clearly violated principles. Ending the D.C. slave trade and selling slaves was morally wrong and most did not believe.

The slave trade in the district, southerners argued, was deeply symbolic as were the laws that would require the federal process of capturing runaway slaves and millions of dollars. Southerners wanted the national government to stop the noncooperation on the return of fugitives and that the federal government should support the federal government.

Zachary Taylor, who had spent most of his life in Kentucky, was elected president. In March 1844 the new Congress met, hoping for a new beginning. One of the newest members of Congress was in fact the most senior politician in Kentucky. Clay was first elected to Congress in 1806–7, 1810–11, and also served in the House of Representatives in 1817. Six times he was elected to Congress. It was from that post in 1819–20 that he rose through Congress. This was his Compromise had allowed for sectional interests for three decades. Had there been a union it might have continued to hold up, and territories could have been avoided.

The Missouri Compromise, Clay ran for secretary of state under John Calhoun in 1832 and again in 1844. In 1848 he expected to run once more but lost the Whig nomination to the hero of the Mexican War, Zachary Taylor, who then won the election. With this career of fame, success, and ultimate disappointment, Clay returned to the Senate in 1849.

Clay’s Return to the Senate

The seventy-two-year-old junior senator from Kentucky returned to the Senate after an absence of seven years. Clay was still deeply bitter about the Whig nomination. In 1844 he had come so close. He lost New York by about five thousand votes. Had Clay carried New York, he would have been president. Clay and other Whigs (including the new vice president, Millard Fillmore, who lost the New York governorship that year) blamed the loss on the abolitionists, fifteen thousand of whom voted for the Liberty Party. It was of course unrealistic and even foolish to believe that committed opponents of bondage would have voted for Clay. Moderate opponents of slavery may have seen him as the lesser of two evils when compared to Polk, but for abolitionists there was no meaningful difference between the slaveholding Clay, who waffled on Texas annexation, and the slaveholding Polk, who more directly supported Texas annexation. In 1848 Clay felt he deserved the Whig nomination, after his years of service to the party and his incredibly narrow loss in the previous election. The year seemed to belong to the Whigs, and Clay wanted to lead the party to victory and finally get to live in the White House. Instead, the party shunted him aside for a general who had never held elective office and had never even voted in an election. Taylor’s victory only increased Clay’s disappointment, since in his mind it should have been his victory.

In 1849 Clay claimed to be uninterested in going back to the Senate, but he also agreed to serve if elected by the Kentucky legislature. This was a common pose of nineteenth-century politicians, coyly denying interest in the offices they hungered for. In this pose Clay was ready to make the great “sacrifice” of serving the people, if they chose him for office. Given the politics of Kentucky at the time, Clay’s response effectively guaranteed his election. If Clay had really not wanted to serve again, he certainly was a skillful enough politician to avoid getting elected to a position he did not want.

Clay also claimed he would only return to the Senate “if I could be persuaded that I could materially contribute to the proper adjustment of the momentous question which has grown out of the acquisition of New Mexico and California.” In other words, he was ready to ride back to Washington on a white horse to save America, as he had done in 1820. Although bruised by three presidential losses and a final failure even to be nominated, Clay’s ego was still strong. He was ready to be America’s savior. He was also ready to save the Whig Party from the impending catastrophe, as he saw it, of the Taylor presidency. Taylor was no politician and while a lifelong Whig (and a lifelong supporter and admirer of Clay), Taylor talked about being a president above party. Clay was never above party, and wanted to redeem the Whig Party and the nation by returning to the Senate. While he was old, and not in great health, he doubtless still dreamed of one more run for the White House. Thus, he happily accepted his election to the Senate, even as he modestly claimed he was uninterested in the job.

Once in the Senate, Clay decided that he, and not President Taylor, should be the leader of the Whig Party. To accomplish this, he would propose a new compromise, replaying his heroic role of 1820. Clay would create the compromise, guide it through Congress, and save the nation. It would make him a hero once again, and maybe, finally, president. To do this he had to oppose a president of his own party.

Taylor did not want a dramatic sweeping bill to solve all the problems of the nation with the stroke of a pen. The methodical, careful general wanted to fight one political battle at a time. He insisted that California, with nearly one hundred thousand residents, enter the Union immediately. Then he would turn to the other issues. He was the only leader in Washington who had actually been to New Mexico. He did not believe slavery could be profitable there, and thus he was not willing to expend a great deal of energy, or political capital, on the issue. Indeed, he wanted to bring New Mexico into the Union as a free state after California was admitted. There were no slaves in New Mexico because under Mexican law slavery had been illegal. The residents of New Mexico did not want slavery but were demanding statehood. New Mexico’s population was greater than the free population of Florida, the most recent slave state to enter the Union. Thus, Taylor hoped to bring New Mexico in right after California. He wanted to avoid a debate over New Mexico admitted, it would be no support for slavery to the Texas debt, fugitive slaves in the District of Columbia. His nondramatic but that left no role for Clay—come the hero of the nation and plotted his own solution.

Clay’s Compromise

On what was literally a dark and stormy day, in the early 1850s, Clay surreptitiously visited Daniel Webster and James S. Calhoun, who were trying to cooperate to pass through a compromise or Compromise Act. The plan was designed to allow California to enter the Union as a free state and to tie Liberty to Union. The two men would call on the slave-state Whigs to align with the Whigs in opposition to Calhoun, who were trying to exclude Mississippi and Texas. The plan was designed to work on the issue of statehood and to bring the Whig party and Webster, rather than having the North and South swing out of the Union.

On January 29, 1850, Clay presented his plan to the Senate. His goal was to have a single bill. He did not present the details or the nature of the compromise. In his Pulitzer Prize–winning account, Potter argues that “Clay’s proposal was a major step in the direction of the North.” Potter argues that...
New Mexico in right after California. This would settle the Texas boundary issue and also avoid a debate over the Wilmot Proviso. With California and New Mexico admitted, it would be easier to organize the rest of the Mexican Cession without any reference to slavery, because Taylor believed there would be no support for slavery in the Utah Territory. Then he could turn to the Texas debt, fugitive slaves, and if necessary the slave trade in the District of Columbia. His nondramatic, piecemeal approach might have worked. But that left no role for Clay—no chance for the Kentucky senator to become the hero of the nation and maybe, finally, the president. Thus, Clay plotted his own solution.

Clay’s Compromise

On what was literally a dark and stormy night in late January 1850, Henry Clay surreptitiously visited Daniel Webster to discuss the compromise. In 1850 Webster had famously debated Senator Robert Hayne of South Carolina, powerfully asserting that no state could nullify or defy federal law. His closing statement—“Liberty and Union, Now and Forever, One and Inseparable”—made him a patriotic icon and a hero in the North for his willingness to tie Liberty to Union. The two giants of the Whig Party secretly agreed to cooperate to push through a compromise that they believed would save the Union. The plan was designed to outflank southern nationalists, like John C. Calhoun, who were trying to create a “southern” party that would force slave-state Whigs to align with them, and force a fundamental restructuring of American politics. The plan would also outflank and marginalize President Taylor, forcing the Whig president to accept the leadership of Clay and Webster, rather than having them follow Taylor’s lead.

On January 29, 1850, Clay presented his eight resolutions to the Senate.22 His goal was to have a single bill that would attract votes from both sections. He did not present the details of the laws, but only sketched out their direction. In his Pulitzer Prize–winning book on the coming of the war, David Potter argues that “Clay’s proposals gave most of the material concessions to the North.” Potter argues that California would enter the Union as a free state but the South gained nothing from the rest of the Mexican Cession because it “was supposedly unsuited to slavery.”23 This traditional analysis is simply wrong. Clay’s compromise and the final legislation passed that fall were overwhelmingly favorable to the South, while giving the North almost nothing of value.

At the outset it is important to understand that the land acquired from Mexico was in fact quite suitable for slavery. In 1850 southern slaves were used in mining and metal industries,24 and could easily have been adapted to mining in what later became the states of Colorado, Nevada, Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico.25 This was consistent with traditional uses of slave labor in antiquity and in Spanish America. In the colonial period slaves were used as herdsman and could have been used in the same way in the Southwest. Ultimately, of course, irrigation would open the southwest to mass crop production (including cotton). Southerners fought to open the Mexican Cession to slavery because, contrary to Potter’s assertion, they emphatically did not believe that the area was “unsuited to slavery.” They knew there were no “natural limits” to slavery, only limits on the production of particular agricultural produce. With this understanding, a careful examination of Clay’s proposals is in order.

Five of Clay’s eight provisions directly benefited the South. He offered the South a new fugitive slave law. This would be the most divisive aspect of the compromise, and one that made the entire series of laws seem to be a complete capitulation to the demands of slavery. The proposals also called for the organization of all of the new territories “without the adoption of any restriction or condition on the subject of slavery,” federal assumption of the debt that the Republic of Texas had when it entered the Union, an iron-clad proclamation that Congress could never end slavery in the District of Columbia without the support of the people of the district and the state of Maryland, and finally another resolution affirming that Congress would never interfere with the interstate slave trade. Two resolutions favored the North, or at least Clay claimed they did. His plan would immediately admit California as a free state and prohibit the sale of slaves in Oregon. The eighth resolution was to determine somewhat, but not wholly, in favor of the North, or freedom, when coupled with new territories without any restrictions on the boundary settlement merely so that another slave territory (New Mexico).

The great gain for the North was the state. However, with nearly one half of the new states, the North would have almost no slaves, and a population impossible to imagine any other outcome. slaves could be used in mines and the population was black and many con- the compromise “gave” to the North of California.

Historians traditionally see California as a free state because it gave the free state a much of the new territories. But this is the wisdom of hindsight. The new territories were open to slavery, the Kansas-Nebraska Act of 1854 created a territory that could turn into slave state.

The fallacy of California state in the Senate is also based on a misreading of the new states as it had been practiced in 1850 both the North and the South historians write about the “pairing” of new states. This in fact rarely happened by the first thirteen states was either already abolished (Massachusetts) or.

---

25The use of Chinese “coolie” labor to build western railroads is yet another example of how slavery could have easily been profitable in the Rocky Mountain West.

---

26For a discussion of attempts to bring the Law of Slavery and Freedom in California
California as a free state and prohibit the public sale of slaves in the District of Columbia. The eighth resolution would settle the Texas boundary dispute somewhat, but not wholly, in favor of New Mexico. Clay believed this was also a resolution that favored the North. But in fact it was of no value to the North, or freedom, when coupled with the provision that organized the new territories without any restriction on slavery. Under the Clay proposals, the boundary settlement merely shifted land from one slave state (Texas) to a slave territory (New Mexico).

The great gain for the North was the admission of California as a free state. However, with nearly one hundred thousand people in the territory, almost no slaves, and a population expanding at a record pace, it was impossible to imagine any other outcome. Southerners eyed California, where slaves could be used in mines and in the region’s fertile valleys. In its first decade of statehood there would be a number of attempts to bring some form of slavery into California.26 But, in 1850 only about 1 percent of the population was black and many of those blacks were free. Whatever southerners might have wanted, California clearly would not be a slave state. Thus, the compromise “gave” to the North what it already had: the free state of California.

Historians traditionally see California statehood as a huge victory for the North because it gave the free states a permanent majority in the Senate. But this is the wisdom of hindsight. With most of present-day Arizona, New Mexico, Utah, and Nevada, as well as portions of Colorado, Oklahoma, and Wyoming open to slavery, there was still room for many new slave states. (The Kansas-Nebraska Act of 1854 would of course create even more territory that could turn into slave states.)

The fallacy of California statehood and a permanent free-state majority in the Senate is also based on a misunderstanding of the process of creating new states as it had been practiced since 1791. At a number of times before 1850 both the North and the South had had a majority in the Senate. Most historians write about the “pairing” of free and slave territories in admitting new states. This in fact rarely happened. After the ratification of the Constitution by the first thirteen states there were five “free” states where slavery was either already abolished (Massachusetts and New Hampshire) or in the process of gradual abolition (Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Connecticut), two northern slave states (New York and New Jersey) and six southern slave states (Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia).

---

This created a Union of seven northern states and six southern states. But it also created a Union of five free states and eight slave states. In 1791 Vermont entered the Union as a free state, but by 1796 Kentucky and Tennessee had come into the Union, creating eight northern and eight southern states, but ten slave states and six free states. In 1799 New York passed a gradual abolition statute, which meant that now there were seven free states and nine slave states. Ohio statehood, in 1803, gave the north a majority of the states—nine to eight—but there was still a majority of slave states until 1804, when New Jersey finally joined the rest of the North with its own gradual emancipation statute. This was the last state to end slavery before the Civil War. From 1804 until 1812 (when Louisiana entered the Union) there was a free-state majority. After that slave and free states entered the Union at different times with apparent pairing, but in each instance there was a short period when the free states had a majority: Indiana (1816) and Mississippi (1817); Illinois (1818) and Alabama (1819); Maine (1820) and Missouri (1821). In 1836 Arkansas entered, giving the South a majority, but then parity was regained with Michigan statehood, in 1837.

In the 1840s this apparent pairing stopped. Florida and Texas both entered in 1845, giving the South a two-state majority, which fell to one state in December 1846 with the admission of Iowa. Parity was not regained until May 1848 when Wisconsin entered the Union. Thus, when the Mexican War began the South had a two-state majority and during the crucial debates over the Wilmot Proviso the South had a one-state majority. It is also important to understand that until 1850 no territory where slavery had been allowed had ever entered the Union as a free state. The lesson of the previous sixty-three years—since the adoption of the Northwest Ordinance, in 1787—was that once slavery was planted in a territory, only slave states would grow there.

Thus, when California entered the Union, in 1850, there was no reason to believe that this would create a permanent free-state majority. This was especially true since Clay’s resolutions allowed slavery in New Mexico and Utah, with nearly four hundred thousand square miles between them, to be divided into slave states.

Clay also proposed to ban “the importation of Negroes into the District of Columbia.” This law only removed slavery sentiment, but it would be “unprofitable to Masters could not buy and sell one another,”27 and they could still ship to the south. Alexandria, Virginia, which was near Washington, D.C., had a slave market that roared. Thus, this piece of the compromise in the District of Columbia could be coupled with Clay’s resolution that the New Mexico boundary be set without the consent of the South.

Clay believed that his proposal that the New Mexico boundary was also a boon to the Union, since aspects of Texas’s seemingly radical proposal (and the final settlement) had a benefit to the North. The proposal would keep the United States together and prevent the South from gaining more territory. Clay believed that this would prevent the further spread of slavery in the future. But the land that did not go to New Mexico would not be granted to Texas.

However, for opponents of a New Mexico boundary was simply a way to ban slavery in the new territories to Texas, which would presumably be allowed in the new territories, a disaster.
Clay also proposed to ban "the slave trade, in slaves brought into" Washington, D.C., "from states or places beyond the District, either to be sold as merchandise or to be transported to other markets without the District of Columbia." This law only removed a visible irritant that tended to fan antislavery sentiment, but it would have absolutely no effect on slavery itself. Masters could still buy and sell slaves privately "by one neighbor to another," and they could still ship them out of the district for sale further south. Alexandria, Virginia, which was just across the Potomac from Washington, had a slave market that remained open to residents of the district. Thus, this piece of the compromise did not harm slavery or undermine its viability in the district. Indeed, a shrewd defender of slavery might have concluded that the proposal would actually reduce the growth of antislavery sentiment by removing an aggravating practice that was always in the face of antislavery members of Congress without actually harming slavery in the nation's capital or anywhere else. This analysis was especially powerful when coupled with Clay's resolution that Congress would never end slavery in the district without the consent of the residents there and in Maryland.

Clay believed that his proposal for the settlement of the New Mexico boundary was also a boon to the North because it defeated the most aggressive aspects of Texas's seemingly insatiable appetite for land. But in fact his proposal (and the final settlement passed by Congress) was also of dubious benefit to the North. The proposal offered Texas less land than it wanted, which would prevent the further growth of slavery in Texas sometime in the future. But the land that did not go to Texas would simply remain part of the New Mexico Territory, where, under Clay's proposal, slavery would be allowed. If the Wilmot Proviso had been adopted, then slavery would have been banned in the new territories, which would have made the debate over the New Mexico boundary more important. Under the Wilmot Proviso every acre not given to Texas would remain free soil.

However, for opponents of slavery Clay's proposal on the Texas–New Mexico boundary was simply a sleight of hand because it did not include any ban on slavery in the new territories. He offered to only add a little land to Texas, which would presumably please the North. But, Clay then opened all of New Mexico to slavery. Implicitly, this meant that slavery would be allowed in the new territories, and southerners surely expected these places would become slave states. This of course contrasts dramatically with President Taylor's goal of immediately admitting New Mexico as a free state.

---

Had the Civil War and the actual compromise not intervened, Clay's proposed settlement of the Texas-New Mexico land issue might actually have helped slavery. Texas wanted about half of present-day New Mexico. If this had occurred then the remaining territory would probably have come into the Union as one single slave state. But, by guaranteeing that the New Mexico Territory would be very large—consisting of most of present-day Arizona and New Mexico and possibly some of present-day West Texas—Clay's proposed settlement of the border dispute actually benefited the South. With about two hundred thousand square miles, this territory was nearly four times the size of the most recent state (Wisconsin) to enter the Union and thus might have provided three or more slave states. The remaining compromise measures wholly benefited the South.

In The Impending Crisis, David Potter argues that the territorial settlement "contributed nothing to the strength of the 'slave power'" because the land was "already covered by the Missouri compromise." The analysis is simply wrong, both as a matter of history, and, more significantly, as a matter of geography. Clay's compromise did more than just take the Wilmot Proviso off the table, which in itself was a major victory for the South. It also substantially undercut the Missouri Compromise. Much of the Mexican Cession—the present-day states of Nevada and Utah, as well as most of Colorado and a bit of Wyoming—lay north of the Missouri Compromise line. Thus, contrary to Potter's incorrect assertions, Clay's compromise actually rejected the Missouri Compromise line by opening over 180,000 square miles of new territory to slavery that was north of the line. This vast space, which became the Utah Territory, was more than four times the size of both North Carolina and Tennessee and six times the size of South Carolina—in other words, large enough to accommodate many new slave states, reaching well north of the Missouri Compromise line. If Clay had been truly interested in a compromise, he would have followed the 1820 line, thus giving some of the new territory to the North and some to the South. Instead, with the exception of California—which was out of his control—he gave all the new territories to the South. And, as already noted, by opening all the new territories to slavery, and thus refusing to apply the Missouri Compromise line to the new territory, Clay completely undermined any value to the free states by settling the Texas–New Mexico boundary in favor of New Mexico.

Just as they have misread the territorial settlement, many historians have misunderstood the importance of Clay’s two resolutions on slavery in the District of Columbia and on the interstate slave trade. Potter writes that these were not “tangible advantages” to the South. In fact, their passage would have been major victories for supporters of slavery, especially when seen in light of all of Clay’s resolutions. Except for a few outlier abolitionists, most opponents of slavery agreed that Congress had no power to regulate slavery in the states where it existed. Political opponents of slavery, from moderates like Abraham Lincoln to radicals like Salmon P. Chase, agreed that there were essentially five areas where Congress could regulate slavery. The first was the African slave trade, which had been banned in 1808 and was not an issue in 1850. Second was in the territories, where Congress had the power to ban slavery. Of course, Clay’s compromise measures would preempt that by opening all the remaining new territories to slavery. Third was the regulation of the District of Columbia, where Congress had specific and plenary power under the Constitution to “exercise exclusive Legislation in all Cases.” It was under this power that Congress would ban the public sale of slaves in the district, which was one of Clay’s resolutions. But, under Clay’s other resolution on the district, Congress would have voluntarily ceded its powers over the district to the people who lived there and to the state of Maryland. Never before (or since) had Congress promised not to exercise one of its constitutionally enumerated powers without first getting the approval of a single state. The fourth area of congressional regulation concerned the interstate slave trade. The Constitution gave Congress complete power to regulate commerce “among the several States,” which of course included the interstate slave trade. Under Clay’s resolution, Congress

29Ibid., p. 100.
30Opponents of slavery complained that Congress never adequately funded the U.S. naval ships operating off the coast of West Africa known as the Africa Squadron, which was charged with suppressing the illegal trade. Meanwhile, in the aftermath of the Compromise of 1850, southern nationalists began to argue for a reopening of the African trade.
31Ibid., p. 100.
32Ibid.
would promise never to exercise the power that it had. This was an unprecedented abdication of congressional power. Congress always has the option to refuse to exercise a constitutional power. In fact, the failure to regulate the domestic slave trade was an example of this. But, it was one thing for Congress to choose not to exercise a power because Congress felt legislation was unwise or unnecessary. It was quite another to do what Clay wanted, which was for Congress to promise never to exercise its power.

Clay’s proposals were also a direct assault on political antislavery and antislavery constitutionalism. Clay’s compromise was essentially an invitation to political opponents of slavery to give up and disband. If Clay’s resolution on the slave trade and slavery in the District of Columbia had been adopted, the legislature would have been on record as saying that any political opposition to slavery was illegitimate. Moreover, the resolutions would have signaled to the nation that the Garrisonian abolitionists were right: the government was in the hands of the slave power.

The fifth area of congressional power concerned the return of fugitive slaves. Many constitutional scholars and jurists had argued that Congress did not in fact have a role to play here, because the fugitive slave provision was entirely directed at the states, and it was in a section of the Constitution that never even mentioned the national government. However, in an overwhelmingly proslavery decision, the Supreme Court settled this issue in favor of congressional power and the South in Prigg v. Pennsylvania. Justice Joseph Story’s opinion declared that Congress had full authority, and full responsibility, to ensure the return of fugitive slaves. If Congress had plenary power to regulate the return of fugitive slaves, then it could do so in a variety of ways. Clay’s resolution did not spell out any details—that came later. But, the eventual law—the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850—would be an enormous legislative victory for “the slave power.” It would create the first national system of law enforcement and deny alleged fugitives—including free blacks wrongly claimed as fugitive slaves—fundamental due-process rights.

---

33Art. IV, sec. 3, cl. 9 of the Constitution provides: “No Person held to Service or Labour in one State, under the Laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in Consequence of any Law or Regulation therein, be discharged from such Service or Labour, but shall be delivered up on Claim of the Party to whom such Service or Labour may be due.”

---

Debating Clay’s Bill

From February until July 4 the Senate was dominated by two men—Clay and Calhoun. Clay’s articulation of the Missouri Compromise was later supported by Sam Houston, John C. Calhoun of South Carolina, and Jefferson Davis of Mississippi. Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois, Daniel Webster of Massachusetts, and James Buchanan of Pennsylvania were among the Senate’s most eloquent abolitionists. Clay with charm and logic tried to persuade the Senate to back his resolution to return fugitive slaves to Missouri immediately and then the other issue was the absurd demand that the United States buy Mexico—all the way to Santa Fe—over the saber rattling of the governor of Texas. Clay was prepared to use the void in a bellicose atmosphere Congress could be reelected. The United States, the perspective of the administration might settle the Texas-Mexico statehood, would settle more of the federal territory, just as if the fugitive would be dead by the end of the month and James Mason of Virginia read it. Stultifyingly misunderstood. Historians write about the “great triumvirate” of Clay, Webster, and Calhoun, but if they were not writing a book about the constitutional power to grant freedom and slavery were incompatible. Clay’s resolution was to demand that the supported the democratic notions of majority rule be time of pent-up anger and frustra
Debating Clay’s Bill

From February until July 4 the Senate debated Clay’s measures. The debates were some of the most eloquent and memorable in American history. On February 4, Clay with charm and wit set out his plan to resolve the crisis. He was later supported by Sam Houston of Texas and predictably opposed by Jefferson Davis of Mississippi. Speaking for President Taylor, Senator Jacob Miller of New Jersey insisted that California be admitted to the Union immediately and then the other issues could be settled. The only other pressing issue was the absurd demand emanating from Austin that half of New Mexico—all the way to Santa Fe—belonged to Texas. Taylor lost little sleep over the saber rattling of the government in Austin. The former general and war hero was prepared to personally lead the army in New Mexico to stop an invasion of federal territory, just as President Andrew Jackson has been prepared to march to South Carolina to suppress nullification. Thus, from the perspective of the administration, California statehood, followed by New Mexico statehood, would settle most of the territorial issues. Then in a more relaxed atmosphere Congress could craft a new fugitive slave law, organize the Utah Territory, settle the Texas debt question, and if necessary consider the slave trade in the national capital. Taylor’s program might have worked, but Clay was not about to defer to a president of his own party and therefore lose his chance at glory and perhaps the White House.

On March 4, John C. Calhoun came to the Senate to oppose Clay’s compromise, Taylor’s solution, and just about any other legislative solution that could have ended the crisis. By this time Calhoun was fading fast—he would be dead by the end of the month—and was too weak to read his own speech. James Mason of Virginia read it for him. Calhoun’s speech is memorable, but often misunderstood. Historians looking for glory and heroism, who talk about the “great triumvirate” of Webster, Clay, and Calhoun, fail to see that in the end Calhoun did not want a solution to the crisis. He wanted an excuse to dissolve the Union, and his whole speech was a threat to do just that, if he could not have everything he wanted—including things Congress lacked the constitutional power to grant. His speech in effect acknowledged that slavery and freedom were incompatible within the same Union. His solution was to demand that the supporters of human liberty be silenced and democratic notions of majority rule be undone. Calhoun’s speech reflected a lifetime of pent-up anger and frustration, for like Webster and Clay, Calhoun,

---

"No Person held to Service or Labour norther shall, in Consequence of any Service or Labour, but shall be delivered labour may be due.”

See generally Paul Finkelman, “Story Justice Joseph Story’s Judicial Nation-too, had dreamed of being president. He also dreamed of shaping the country entirely his way.

Much of his speech was based on a history of America that simply did not reflect reality. He complained that the “northern section” had “a pre-dominance in every part of the Government.” This claim ignored the fact that nine of the nation’s twelve presidents had been southern-born slave owners, including the current incumbent, Zachary Taylor. All the northerners were one-term presidents, while five of the southerners served two terms. Slaveholders had held the presidency for fifty years while nonslaveholders had held it for a mere twelve years. Since Jefferson took office in 1801 every president except John Quincy Adams had been either a slaveholder or northern Democrat who was closely allied to the South. Similarly, since the Jeffersonian “revolution” of 1801 there had been twenty-five Congresses, and southerners had been Speaker of the House in all but five of them. None of the four northerners who had been Speaker had shown any hostility to the South or slavery. Similarly, except for a brief period in the 1820s and early 1830s, the Supreme Court always had a southern majority. Equally important, the Democratic Party had dominated American politics since 1800 and southerners had always dominated that party. Thus, many northern Democrats—such as Supreme Court justices Samuel Nelson and Robert Grier and President Martin Van Buren—had consistently supported southern interests. The military had similarly been dominated by slaveholding generals, like Andrew Jackson, Winfield Scott, and Zachary Taylor. Extreme proslavery men, like Calhoun and Abel Upshur of Virginia, had served in presidential cabinets, but no strong antislavery men had ever served in a cabinet.

Calhoun argued that the “cords of Union” could not be broken “at a single blow,” but he claimed that “the slavery question has snapped some of the most important” cords and “greatly weakened all the others.” He noted that the churches had divided over slavery and this signaled an end to the Union. But surely Calhoun did not think Congress could bring the Methodists, Baptists, or Presbyterians back together. This was not evidence of the failure of the political system. But distinctions between politics and the Constitution, Calhoun argued the “abolition party”—even though, except for the members of such “party.” But for Calhoun, the North could be saved only in the North, because Calhoun also contains views and feelings more of his own.

For Calhoun the key to restoring the Union belonged to the southern states, and it was consistent with their honor and tradition. Taylor’s proposals would save slave owners and planters. The territories and a guarantee that they would be the property of the United States was exactly what Clay was offering. Calhoun wanted the southerners “cease the agitation—atonal amendment guaranteeing slavery and охерел.” Here then, was the Everywhere the northerners had to recognize their opposition to oppose or denounce it. This was impossible, short of a constitutional convention. Thus, while Calhoun pretended he was willing to accomplish, short of a constitutional convention.

Potter’s description of Calhoun’s error since Milton’s Satan in Remini’s claim that he was “passing” power and logic to the Union could be saved only in the North and that the election of the president were a give of Professor Remini, the speech was crafted justification for the failure of the political system. But distinctions between politics and the Constitution, Calhoun argued the “abolition party”—even though, except for the members of such “party.” But for Calhoun, the North could be saved only in the North, because Calhoun also contains views and feelings more of his own.

For Calhoun the key to restoring the Union belonged to the southern states, and it was consistent with their honor and tradition. Taylor’s proposals would save slave owners and planters. The territories and a guarantee that they would be the property of the United States was exactly what Clay was offering. Calhoun wanted the southerners “cease the agitation—atonal amendment guaranteeing slavery and охерел.” Here then, was the Everywhere the northerners had to recognize their opposition to oppose or denounce it. This was impossible, short of a constitutional convention. Thus, while Calhoun pretended he was willing to accomplish, short of a constitutional convention.

Potter’s description of Calhoun’s error since Milton’s Satan in Remini’s claim that he was “passing” power and logic to the Union could be saved only in the North and that the election of the president were a give of Professor Remini, the speech was crafted justification for the failure of the political system. But distinctions between politics and the Constitution, Calhoun argued the “abolition party”—even though, except for the members of such “party.” But for Calhoun, the North could be saved only in the North, because Calhoun also contains views and feelings more of his own.

54 William Henry Harrison, while elected from Ohio, was from a distinguished Virginia planter family and owned slaves most of his life. As territorial governor of Ohio he had attempted to get Congress to modify the Northwest Ordinance to allow slavery there. Paul Finkelman, Slavery and the Founders: Race and Liberty in the Age of Jefferson, 2d ed. (Armonk, N.Y., 2001), pp. 58–70.
56 Ibid., p. 452.
57 Ibid., pp. 453, 455.
58 Potter, Impending Crisis, p. 98.
failure of the political system. But Calhoun was not interested in making distinctions between politics and nonpolitical opposition to slavery. Thus, Calhoun argued the “abolition party” in the North was destroying the Union—even though, except for the minuscule Liberty Party, there was in fact no such “party.” But for Calhoun, the “abolition party” consisted of everyone in the North, because Calhoun asserted, “Every portion of the North entertains views and feelings more or less hostile to” slavery.29

For Calhoun the key to restoring the Union was entirely in the hands of the North. He wanted Congress to adopt “such measures as will satisfy the States belonging to the southern section that they can remain in the Union consistently with their honor and their safety.” But neither Clay’s nor President Taylor’s proposals would satisfy this, even though both men were southern slave owners and planters. Calhoun demanded southern access to all the territories and a guarantee that fugitive slaves would be returned—which was exactly what Clay was offering. But he wanted more. He insisted that northerners “cease the agitation of the slave question” and pass a constitutional amendment guaranteeing the South “the power . . . of protecting herself.”30 Here then, was the key to Calhoun’s solution to the problem: northerners had to recognize the legitimacy and justice of slavery and cease to oppose or denounce it. This was not something Congress could ever accomplish, short of a constitutional amendment prohibiting antislavery speech. Thus, while Calhoun pretended to want to preserve the Union, he articulated utterly impossible conditions for that result.

Potter’s description of Calhoun as the “the most majestic champion of error since Milton’s Satan in Paradise Lost”31 is far more accurate than Remini’s claim that he was “passionately devoted to the Union.” But both exaggerate the power and logic of Calhoun’s speech. Calhoun declared that the Union could be saved only if freedom of speech and press were abolished in the North and that the notion of majority rule in Congress or in the election of the president were abandoned. This was not, despite the claims of Professor Remini, the speech of a lover of the Union. It was a carefully crafted justification for secession and disunion.

Four days later, on March 7, Calhoun returned to the Senate to hear Webster speak on the compromise. Doubtless he expected Webster to support the Wilmot Proviso and to denounce slavery. He probably even wanted such a speech, because at this point Calhoun was not arguing for a plausible compromise but instead was setting the stage for disunion. But Webster surprised Calhoun and the nation—and lost almost all credibility in his home state—by supporting the compromise. He poignantly told his colleagues: “I wish to speak to-day, not as a Massachusetts man, nor as a Northern man, but as an American. . . . I speak to-day for the preservation of the Union. ‘Hear me for my cause.’” His rhetoric was supremely nationalist, but it was also a betrayal of his state, his section, and the assumption of his supporters that he opposed slavery. Webster’s speech also redefined nationalism by implying that to be an American one had to accept the spread of slavery into the new territories and support a fugitive slave law that denied even the most fundamental rights of due process to alleged fugitive slaves. Indeed, in the fugitive slave law Congress gratuitously declared that “all good citizens are hereby commanded to aid and assist in the prompt and efficient execution of this law.” For Webster, a good citizen was someone willing to participate in shipping blacks to bondage without a trial or any due process hearing.

29Ibid., p. 452.
30Ibid., pp. 453-455.
31Potter, Impending Crisis, p. 98.

Staunch opponents of slavery, like William H. Seward, Salmon P. Chase, and Hannibal Hamlin, weighed in against the compromise, but not the Union. They were thoroughly opposed to secession and disunion, but they did not believe that the Union had to be built on a foundation of human bondage. They argued that Clay’s proposals were wrong and especially that the proposed fugitive slave law was immoral. Speaking as a man who had defended black rights for his whole career, Seward declared the compromise was “radically wrong and essentially vicious, involving the surrender of the exercise of judgment and conscience.” President Taylor was unhappy with the self-righteousness of Seward’s speech, but he was not entirely in disagreement with Seward’s complaints that the compromise gave too much to slavery and rejected American values of liberty and fundamental justice. Taylor wanted immediate admission of California and New Mexico as well. He did not really believe Texas would force a confrontation over the sands of eastern New Mexico, but Old Rough and Ready ordered troops to New Mexico to be ready, and if necessary, rough, in enforcing American law. Taylor opposed opening the Southwest to slavery, and he had no interest in tying California admission to a new fugitive slave law. Clay nevertheless moved forward in opposition to the president of his party.

Webster may have spoken “not err: man, but as an American,” but he had never been his party’s most successful candidate for the Union, but now with Webster leadership. On May 21, Clay op- en president’s plan would not solve “bleed more profusely than ever.” Clay, the longtime leader of the Democrat, Calhoun. Meanwhile, supported Clay and the compromis a tie in the Senate, he would do bill also passed the House, this would have undermined hisident and two leading Whig senator first Whig president to hold office.

That was where the debate started Fourth holiday. A week later Zach was most obscure vice president ever.

President Fillmore and

On July 10, 1850, Millard Fillmore take the oath as president of the entire cabinet, something no other days later he sent the Senate neast important nominee was Dan state. This gave Fillmore such a position, but it also removed an impor Senate. Fillmore was unable to in of war and secretary of the inter the fate of the Mexican Cession an Mexico, Fillmore had no one inuary for both issues.

Webster may have spoken “not as a Massachusetts man, nor as a Northern man, but as an American,” but he also spoke as a Whig who was bitter that he had never been his party’s presidential candidate and hostile to one of the party’s most successful candidates. Clay, like Webster, hoped to save the Union, but now with Webster’s support he directly challenged Taylor’s leadership. On May 21, Clay openly attacked Taylor saying that the Whig president’s plan would not solve the crisis but would lead the country to “bleed more profusely than ever.” In his opposition to the Whig president, Clay, the longtime leader of the Whig Party, was in league with the arch-Democrat, Calhoun. Meanwhile, Taylor’s vice president, Millard Fillmore, supported Clay and the compromise. He told Taylor that if he had to break a tie in the Senate, he would do so in favor of Clay’s bill. Assuming Clay’s bill also passed the House, this would force Taylor to veto the compromise, which would have undermined his administration.43 Thus, a Whig vice president and two leading Whig senators worked to destroy the presidency of the first Whig president to hold office long enough to accomplish anything.44

That was where the debate stood when Congress recessed for the July Fourth holiday. A week later Zachary Taylor was dead. Millard Fillmore, the most obscure vice president ever, was now president of the United States.

President Fillmore and the Compromise

On July 10, 1850, Millard Fillmore went to the House of Representatives to take the oath as president of the United States. Later that day he fired his entire cabinet, something no other accidental president has ever done. Ten days later he sent the Senate nominations for some cabinet positions. His most important nominee was Daniel Webster, who became his secretary of state. This gave Fillmore a much-needed seasoned adviser in his administration, but it also removed an important voice for the compromise from the Senate. Fillmore was unable to immediately find people to serve as secretary of war and secretary of the interior. Thus, as Congress continued to debate the fate of the Mexican Cession and Texas made noises about invading New Mexico, Fillmore had no one in place to run the departments most necessary for both issues.

43Ibid., pp. 141, 167. See also Paul Finkelman, Millard Fillmore (New York, 2011).
44In 1840 William Henry Harrison had been elected as a Whig, but he died a month after taking office.
As the Senate continued to debate Clay’s omnibus bill, Fillmore faced his first crisis—without the benefit of having his cabinet in place. Just a few days after he was sworn in, Fillmore received a letter from Governor Peter H. Bell of Texas—addressed to the now-deceased President Taylor—demanding that the United States recognize Texas’s extravagant claims to much of New Mexico, including Santa Fe, and to disavow the U.S. Army’s actions to preserve the integrity of the New Mexico Territory.

Bell’s absurdly arrogant communication would probably have bemused Taylor, a commander in chief with vast military experience and a president with a full cabinet in place, including a secretary of war to deal with military issues and a secretary of the interior to deal with territorial questions. Indeed, Taylor was prepared to personally lead the army into New Mexico to stop an invasion of federal territory, just as Jackson had been prepared to march to South Carolina to suppress nullification. Fillmore had no military experience, no secretary of war, no secretary of the interior, and no sense of the impossibility of Texas enforcing its will against a determined American president. Texas had a lot of land, very few people, and huge debts. More than 750 miles of mostly trackless desert and scrublands separated Austin from Santa Fe. Experiened soldiers were stationed in New Mexico, and it is hard to imagine Texas successfully invading New Mexico. In August, Fillmore ordered another 750 soldiers to New Mexico. Despite his understanding that he needed to defend United States territory against an invasion from any source, Fillmore was ultimately unwilling to actually confront the absurd demands of the Texans that, having once been admitted in to the Union, the state could now unilaterally demand that its boundaries be expanded. Taylor had been ready to confront this argument head-on. Fillmore vacillated. He sent more troops to New Mexico but then gave Texas almost everything it demanded.

Fillmore might have sent a stern response to Bell reminding him who was commander in chief, who had an army, and who did not. Or he might have sent him a lawyerly explanation of how the U.S. Constitution worked. He did neither. Nor did he move to bring New Mexico into the Union along with California, as Taylor had wanted. This would have preempted the Texas debate and mooted the Wilmot Proviso debate. By this time residents of New Mexico had already held a convention and written a state constitution that was on its way to Washington. Thus, statehood could have been quickly accomplished.

In their proposed constitution, the Texans were wrong. They were wrong for their new state, based on the occupation which would have moved the New Mexican state to the Union preserved the existing state could never define its own borders. Thus, the territorial claims of the new state, just as the Texas claims to territories in New Mexico were legally baseless.

These constitutional and legal arguments aside, they were wrong. Texas was not alone. Congress had already set; New Mexican was determining whether or not it could exist, and if the 1848 election. The extreme scorciatoli in their territorial claims with New Mexico, there might have forcefully sent Congress to do what was necessary or the other.

Instead, Fillmore was so paral\textsuperscript{4}seems to have forgotten that he was president. Rather than lead on this issue, he refused to submit the proposed omnibus bill, which was set to expire. It was state bonds that the United States paid to the Souths. Hamilton. Such an argument would have been voting power in the South.
In their proposed constitution, the New Mexicans made extravagant claims for their new state, based on the old Mexican Department of New Mexico, which would have moved the New Mexico boundary deep into what everyone agreed was clearly the state of Texas. Under the U.S. Constitution, no state could be forced to give up its own territory against its will. Admission to the Union preserved the existing borders of Texas. Furthermore, a territory could never define its own boundaries. Only Congress could do that. Thus, the territorial claims of the New Mexico convention had no basis in law, just as the Texas claims to territory acquired by the United States from Mexico were legally baseless.

These constitutional and legal realities created the potential for presidential leadership. A strong president could have firmly, but tactfully, told both sides they were wrong. Texas was in the Union with the boundaries Congress had already set; New Mexico could enter the Union with boundaries that Congress would create. Since New Mexico had a free population greater than Florida’s, it was certainly entitled to admission into the Union. There were many variations on this strategy. Fillmore might have offered to support a compromise that would have admitted New Mexico as a free state under the theory of popular sovereignty that Lewis Cass had proposed in the 1848 election. The extreme southern hotheads were all Democrats, and they would have been forced to repudiate the principles of their own party if they objected to New Mexico statehood on this basis. Fillmore then might have simultaneously urged that Congress pay off the bonds of the Texas republic, as Clay had proposed. He might even have offered a compromise on its territorial claims with New Mexico, as Clay also proposed. Or, he might have forcefully sent Congress a concrete proposal for settling the boundary one way or the other.

Instead, Fillmore was so paralyzed by the Texans’ saber rattling that he seems to have forgotten that he was both president and commander in chief. Rather than lead on this issue, he moved to appease the Texas legislature by refusing to submit the proposed New Mexico constitution to Congress. He offered no guidance to Congress at this time, beyond supporting Clay’s omnibus bill, which was set to open up all the Mexican Cession to slavery—

Fillmore might have argued that the Texas debt was similar to the Revolutionary War state bonds that the United States paid off under the programs of Secretary of State Alexander Hamilton. Such an argument would have strengthened a sense of federalism and national power in the South.
despite the clear objections of the residents of New Mexico, and the repudiation of the Missouri Compromise in Nevada, Utah, and Colorado.

With no leadership from the Whig in the White House, on July 24 the Democrats proposed that Congress not actually set the Texas—New Mexico boundary but instead create a commission to do so. On the heels of this, a Georgia Whig, William Dawson, put together a coalition of southerners and northern Democrats to stipulate that, until the commission met, the New Mexico territorial government would have no authority in the disputed area. This was patently unfair to the claims of New Mexico, and it led to a total unraveling of the compromise. A week later, on July 31, another Whig, James Pearce, who was a close ally of Fillmore, proposed that the whole New Mexico issue be removed from the pending bill. A series of other amendments followed, and by the end of the day the compromise was dead.

The compromise had begun with Clay attempting to wrest control of the Whig Party from its own president. Clay envisioned he would once again be the party leader and hero of the nation, as he had been when he guided the Missouri Compromise through Congress, in 1820. It might finally make him president. But it had backfired. In the Senate, the party had become utterly leaderless, with two Whigs—both of whom supported the compromise—amending the compromise to death while Clay looked on helplessly. The old president was dead, and thus there was no need for Clay to dethrone him. The new president, a lifetime Whig, offered no leadership on the nation’s pressing issues and had been prepared to work with Clay. But Clay failed to get other Whigs to go along. The aging Kentucky senator, devastated by the collapse of all his work, left Washington even though Congress remained in session.

At this point, the Illinois Democrat, Senator Stephen A. Douglas, put the compromise back together. This was the ultimate irony of Clay’s and Fillmore’s machinations against Taylor. Designed to promote Clay and regular Whigs, and to undermine Taylor; the compromise ended up catapulting the Democrat Douglas to greater prominence and devastating Fillmore’s presidency and the Whig Party.

Douglas broke the compromise into its component parts and pushed them through Congress one at a time, with a small group of southern and northern senators and representatives voting for all, or almost all, the measures, and then picking up the rest of the southerners or northerners for particular issues. This new configuration of the legislation as a series of separate and disconnected laws undermined any opportunity for compromise between competing parties. The filibuster was dead. The South, because, at most, only the northern territories would vote for California statehood and closing the New Mexican boundary—had strong northern support or required a threat.

Thus, the final Compromise of 1850 was, in fact, it might best be seen as the Ayres Act, so named and treated and threatened to destroy the ultra-southern New Mexico. A frightened and increduous the fourth northerner in the national political leadership and cowed into giving southerners everything they asked for in Congress caved as well. The states of the North received almost nothing in return but the active support of a New Mexican state with a northern Democrat to defeat the proposal.

Fillmore’s response to the demands of the Southern and the northern capitation tax in a special message to Congress on Texas political masterstroke,” was in fact, he pointed out the growing economic relationship between Mexico and Texas but between the United States and Mexico. He detailed the way the Constitution gave the power to call out the militia or army. He explained how the disputed land had been entered New Mexico they would be merely as intruders.” This was often have called invaders, rebels, or even a knight’s description of invaders as trespassers as a warning of the lessons of Andrew Jackson and his renegade states. The message up to 43 David Potter uses this term in his chapter on the Kansas—Nebraska Act.

44 Holt, American Whig Party, p. 534.
ments of New Mexico, and the repub-calican senators of Nevada, Utah, and Colorado.

In the White House, on July 24 the committee on Texas—New Mexico commission met, the together a coalition of southerners southern senators, who, until the commission met, the would have no authority in the disputed newspaper, the Washington Star, on July 24, another Whig,

Fillmore, proposed that the whole ending bill. A series of other amendments the compromise was dead.

They were attempting to wrest control of the envisioned he would once again be assuming had been when he guided the South, and it led to a week later, on July 31, another Whig,

Fillmore, proposed that the whole ending bill. A series of other amende-

ments the compromise was dead.

Thus, the final Compromise of 1850 favored the South over the North and slavery over freedom. Potter called it the Armistice of 1850. But, in fact, it might best be seen as the Appeasement of 1850. Southerners bustered and threatened to destroy the Union; Texans threatened to invade

New Mexico. A frightened and inexperienced accidental president—only the fourth northerner in the nation’s history to hold the office—was easily cowed into giving southerners everything they wanted. Leaderless northerners in Congress caved as well. The South gained everything it wanted, and the North received almost nothing in return. The appeasement was orchestrated with the active support of a northern Whig president working closely with a northern Democrat to defeat the interests of most northerners.

Fillmore’s response to the demands of Texas illustrates his failure of leadership and the northern capitulation to southern threats. Fillmore’s August 6 special message to Congress on Texas, which one historian has called “a political masterstroke,” was in fact almost cowardly. The president began by correctly pointing out that the boundary dispute was not between New Mexico and Texas, but between the government of the United States and Texas. He detailed the way the Constitution operated, noted that he had the power to call out the militia or army under some circumstances, and explained how the disputed land had been acquired by a treaty between the United States and Mexico. The president asserted that if armed Texans entered New Mexico they would be “trespassers” and were to “be regarded merely as intruders.” This was odd terminology for what others might have called invaders, rebels, or even traitors. So far, except for his milque toast description of invaders as trespassers, Fillmore seemed to have learned the lessons of Andrew Jackson and Zachary Taylor on how to deal with renegade states. The message up to this point resembled Daniel Webster’s 44David Potter uses this term in his chapter “The Armistice of 1850,” in Impending Crisis.

great confrontation with Senator Hayne over nullification. Doubtless this reflected the fact that Webster helped Fillmore write the message.

But this initial strong response was just a prelude to Fillmore's total capitulation to the Texans. Astoundingly, he then asserted that the “executive government of the United States has no power or authority” to determine what the boundary line of the United States was before President Polk signed the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. In other words, the president of the United States told Congress that it was not his job to assert what the national boundaries were, even though every president since George Washington had asserted strong plenary power over foreign policy. If this were really the case, then the president did not know where to collect foreign duties or when an invading army had entered the nation. Throughout his life Fillmore had been allied with nativists, and in 1856 he would run for president on the ticket of the anti-immigrant, anti-Catholic Know-Nothing Party. But here he argued that even if the nation chose to regulate or ban foreign immigration, the president was incapable of determining when a foreigner had entered the nation. Having just declared that only Congress could determine what the boundary of the United States had been before 1848, Fillmore compounded his abdication of leadership by adding that “the assent of the State of Texas may be necessary” to decide where the boundary was.

Thus, Fillmore and Webster decided unilaterally that Texas should have a veto power—a power of nullification—over the executive branch and Congress. Under Fillmore’s bizarre theory, Congress could pass a law deciding what the boundaries of the New Mexico Territory were, and the president could sign that law, but Texas would have the right—the power—to reject the result. Webster had apparently forgotten where he once stood on the question of nullification; Fillmore had apparently forgotten that the Constitution was the “supreme law of the land.”

Fillmore’s plan was to guide Congress in passing a law that the Texans would accept. The final settlement over the southwest, which passed the Senate on August 9, gave Texas about seventy thousand square miles more than Clay’s bill had (and took that territory away from New Mexico), opened up the entire New Mexico Territory to slavery, and gave Texas a $10 million bailout. The politics of this included Webster—that if the issues were not between Texas and the United States, the United States and Mexico desert. Taylor, the general who had the geography of Texas and New Mexico, preposterous. But Fillmore, without a new bill and never having seen the vast desert, turned the idea that Texas could somehow raise the entire United States’ House patronage, pressured New Mexico to pass the Texas bill. The Senate, led by Douglas, voted on California statehood until a vote on New Mexico statehood. Significantly, two southerners, Houston of Texas and Thomas Hart Benton of the two senators from Delaware, were Whig (except those from Delaware). This underscores the lack of compromise.

On August 15 the Senate voted for New Mexico, without a ban on slavery, even though the New Mexico had Constitution and in effect to give federal support to a slave state.

Finally, after passing all the laws forbidding admitting California as a free state, and the Columbia slave trade bill, and the New Mexico statehood bill, and then adding the fugitive slave bill, and then at last a bill admitting Texas, Northerners had a de facto abolition of secession. Northerners had a huge majority of some of the proslavery measures, bailout. The politics of this included a fear—perpetuated by Fillmore and Webster—that if the issues were not settled there would be civil war between Texas and the United States of America over who owned the New Mexico desert. Taylor, the general who had served in the region and knew the geography of Texas and New Mexico, would have thought this was preposterous. But Fillmore, without a working cabinet or a secretary of war, and never having seen the vast deserts of the Southwest, was cowed by the idea that Texas could somehow raise an army that would be a match for that of the entire United States! Webster, now seemingly in control of White House patronage, pressured New England’s Whig senators to accept the Texas bill. The Senate, led by Douglas, made sure that there would be no vote on California statehood until after the Texas boundary was resolved. Four days after the Texas vote, the Senate voted 34–18 in favor of California statehood. Significantly, two southern Democrats voted for the bill, Sam Houston of Texas and Thomas Hart Benton of Missouri. With the exception of the two senators from Delaware, no southern Whigs supported California statehood. Webster and Fillmore had pressured New England Whigs to support the Texas bill, but they were unwilling or unable to get any southern Whig (except those from Delaware) to support California statehood. This underscores the lack of compromise in the Compromise of 1850.

On August 15 the Senate voted to organize the New Mexico Territory without a ban on slavery, even though by this time everyone was well aware that a convention in New Mexico had written a constitution that would have made it a free state. This was a blunt attempt to force slavery into the territory and in effect to give federal support to turning a free New Mexico into a slave state.

Finally, after passing all the laws allowing slavery in the new territories and admitting California as a free state, the Senate turned to the District of Columbia slave trade bill and the fugitive slave law. As already noted, the slave trade bill was largely symbolic. It removed an irritation that northerners abhorred, but it had absolutely no effect on the system of slavery or even the sale of slaves. Secretary of State Daniel Webster, Senator Stephen A. Douglas, and President Fillmore sold this law to northerners as a fair trade-off for the new fugitive slave law. But that was a mirage.

Each bill had to pass the House as well, where the politics were more complex. Northerners had a huge majority in the House and could have blocked some of the proslavery measures, or at least forced amendments to them.
But in the end that did not happen. On really tough votes, like the fugitive slave law, many northern congressmen simply failed to show up to vote, rather than fight the law. The final vote on the Texas–New Mexico boundary was possible only because Fillmore pressured northern Whigs in the House to support the bill even though most had been elected on pledges that they would never vote to allow slavery in the new territories. Representative Abraham Schermherhorn of Rochester, for example, supported the bill because Fillmore was prepared to do everything in his power to block Schermherhorn's re-nomination. Schermherhorn came from the heart of New York's antislavery "Burned-Over District" and the home of the nation's most famous black abolitionist, Frederick Douglass, but on this proslavery bill he abandoned his constituents. Using threats and promises of patronage, Fillmore managed to get just enough votes in the House to get each component of the package through Congress.

In September it all came together. On the ninth, Fillmore signed bills on the Texas–New Mexico boundary, California statehood, and the Utah Territory. Slavery was now legal everywhere in all the new territories, including land well north of the Missouri Compromise line. This was a huge victory for the South, especially when paired with the settlement over Texas that gave that slave state more land and ten million dollars. Since 1837 every territory where slavery was allowed had become a slave state. While some politicians, like Clay, Webster, and Douglas, argued that slavery was unsuited for these territories, southerners knew better. As already discussed, slaves had historically been used in mining and in ranching. Indeed, the first cowboys in America were black slaves in South Carolina. If what had just become West Texas was viable slave country—as the Texans insisted—then so too would be the land just over the border in New Mexico and in the mining country of Utah and Nevada.

On September 18, Fillmore signed the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850. Two days later a last crumb was offered to the North as Fillmore signed the bill prohibiting bringing slaves into the District of Columbia for the purpose of sale. It did not prevent the private sale of slaves already in the district. Nor did it prevent people from moving into the district with slaves. It was a symbolic victory for freedom but nothing more.

The abandonment of both the Wilmot Proviso and the Missouri Compromise would lead to a decade of controversy over the status of slavery in the territories. Emboldened by his success in 1850 with the cooperation of a Whig president, in 1854 Stephen Douglas had err- err-faces Democrat in the_new remained of the Missouri Compromise in Kansas and the final crisis leading quences of the New Mexico and Utah territories to an apparent in the 1850s. What was receive, was the potential disaster to Fillmore's enthusiastic support for	one of it, would become the hallmark. This support destroyed his administration. The "compromise" might have worked.

The Fugitive Slave Law

The Fugitive Slave Law of 1850 was statutes ever adopted by the Unisational system of law enforcement. It was a slave law that authorized any judisive slave case and remand a fugitive agent. The law provided very little that free blacks would not be taken. In many states, almost every northern state had provision for alleged fugitive slave cases. The Supreme Court said these laws were ferred with the implementation of the fugitive slave law that Congress did not have the under federal law. Almost immediately agents were to enforce the law and a number of judges from hearing fugitive slave cases. Private slave catchers were removed from using federal law. Southerners complained, with some justice, that the Fugitive Slave Act made it impossible for them to recover fugitive slaves. With only a few hundred slaves and a similarly small number of fugitive slaves on their own or with profesthis situation by providing for the other.
Whig president, in 1854 Stephen A. Douglas would contrive, with a northern doughtyface Democrat in the White House, to eviscerate almost all that remained of the Missouri Compromise line, setting the stage for Bleeding Kansas and the final crisis leading to the Civil War. These long-term consequences of the New Mexico and Utah bills were in the future and not readily apparent in the 1850s. What was apparent, from the moment it was conceived, was the potential disaster that the new fugitive slave law would cause. Fillmore’s enthusiastic support for this law, and his aggressive enforcement of it, would become the hallmark of his administration, and in the end that support destroyed his administration, the Whig Party, and any chance the “compromise” might have worked.

The Fugitive Slave Law of 1850

The Fugitive Slave Law of 1850 was one of the most repressive and unfair statutes ever adopted by the United States. It created, for the first time, a national system of law enforcement. In 1793, Congress had passed a fugitive slave law that authorized any judge—federal, state, or local—to hear a fugitive slave case and remand a fugitive to the custody of a master or a master’s agent. The law provided very lax evidentiary standards and no guarantees that free blacks would not be taken south as fugitives. To protect free blacks, almost every northern state had passed a personal liberty law to guarantee due process for alleged fugitive slaves. In Prigg v. Pennsylvania (1842) the U.S. Supreme Court said these laws were unconstitutional because they interfered with the implementation of a federal law. However, the Court also said that Congress did not have the power to require the states to enforce this federal law. Almost immediately state officials throughout the North refused to enforce the law and a number of states passed legislation prohibiting their judges from hearing fugitive slave cases and prohibiting federal officials or private slave catchers from using state jails to secure alleged fugitive slaves. Southerners complained, with some legitimacy, that these new personal liberty laws made it impossible for them to vindicate their constitutional right to recover fugitive slaves. With only a few federal courts operating in the country and a similarly small number of federal marshals, masters had to pursue their slaves on their own or with professional slave catchers. The 1850 law remedied this situation by providing for the appointment of federal commissioners in every county who were empowered to hear fugitive slave cases and summon sufficient force to secure the return of runaways.

Under the law federal marshals could be fined $1,000 if they failed to "use all proper means to diligently" execute the law. Marshals and commissioners were empowered to call on the militia and the army and to create a posse to enforce the law. The statute gratuitously declared that "all good citizens are hereby commanded to aid and assist in the prompt and efficient execution of this law," although there was no clear remedy if citizens refused to help enforce the law. If these measures failed, however, and marshals were unable to prevent a rescue by a mob, they could be held personally liable for the value of any slave who escaped or was rescued from their custody. No other federal statute had ever provided such penalties for officers who were unable to implement a law.

Any persons who aided or harbored a fugitive slave or interfered with the rendition process, for whatever reason, were subject to a $1,000 fine and six months in jail. In addition, they were subject to civil damages of $1,000 to be paid to the owner of a slave for each slave who was not recovered. Many northerners found these provisions particularly obnoxious because, if literally enforced, a farmer could be fined, sued, or jailed for giving a cup of water to a black person walking down the road. The harsh penalties, and the minimal standards of proof, could force northern whites to assume that all blacks they saw were fugitives, even though in 1850 there were more than 150,000 free blacks living in the North. The new law not only imperiled the liberty of free blacks but also undermined their relationships with their white neighbors. Whites, and even free blacks in the North, might be reluctant to hire a black for fear the person was a fugitive, and the very act of hiring could be a violation of the law. From the perspective of blacks and many white northerners, the act of 1850 had brought the law of slavery into the free states and required northerners to do the bidding of southerners.

These provisions punished free people—white and black—if they helped fugitives. Even more obnoxious were the procedures for returning a slave. Under the law, the alleged slave would get a summary hearing before a federal judge or commissioner. The court order was a writ of habeas corpus. This was the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus under the constitutional provision that persons are free only in response to an invasion or restraint of liberty.

The law required any judge or commissioner to "decide the case" in "a summary manner," with no right to conduct a full trial. If the judge or commissioner had only to present "satisfactory proof of the free status of the alleged fugitive slave. This could be done by certifying" before any judge or magistrate. The potential for fraud, or even mistaken identity, might bring any black who fit the description before a judge and demand the right to go free.

In what was clearly its most unfair or hearing under this act shall be entertained in evidence. Someone could be allowed to offer his or her own version. As one northern minister complained, men to seize a free man in the streets before a commissioner, to make a full inquiry into his personal identity, and in one hour in the presence of armed force on his way to the slave states of the South.

The outrageousness of the test for the testimony of the commissioner judge in favor of the alleged slave was entitled to a $5 fee. If the slave was free, Most northerners viewed this as

The law needlessly threatened the traditional American notions of due process. It was not a bill that could 50Some southerners in fact were contemptuous of the willingness of northerners to participate in the return of fugitive slaves. While the law was being debated, one Kentuckian told Senator Salmon P. Chase that in the South "no man will voluntarily become a negro catcher" and that it would be "an insult" to ask a southern gentleman to do such a thing. Professional slave catchers were "set up in the public estimation only secondary to the professional Negro trader, and that is the lowest possible." Edgar Needham to Salmon P. Chase, Feb. 9, 1850, Salmon P. Chase Papers, Library of Congress.

---

eral judge or commissioner. The court was precluded from even considering a writ of habeas corpus. This was the first time the U.S. Congress suspended the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, and it was done in violation of the constitutional provision that provided that habeas could be suspended only in response to an invasion or rebellion.

The law required any judge or commissioner to "hear and determine the case" in "a summary manner," without a jury. The slave owner or his agent had only to present "satisfactory proof" that the person claimed was a fugitive slave. This could be done by "deposition or affidavit, in writing . . . certified" before any judge or magistrate in the home state of the slave owner. The potential for fraud, or even mistaken identity, was huge. The claimant might bring any black who fit the description in the "deposition or affidavit" before a judge and demand the right to remove the person as a fugitive slave.

In what was clearly its most unfair aspect, the law provided, "In no trial or hearing under this act shall the testimony of such alleged fugitive be admitted in evidence." Someone could be dragged south as a slave and never be allowed to offer his or her own voice as evidence that he or she was free. As one northern minister complained, "It requires but the collusion of two men to seize a freeman in the streets of New York or Boston, to drag him before a commissioner, to make affidavit of his escape from service and of his personal identity, and in one hour the freeman shall be in the custody of an armed force on his way to the slave coffles . . . to be sold to the rice plantations of the South."51

The outrage of the testimony provision was matched by the provision for paying the commissioners and judges who heard these cases. If a judge ruled in favor of the alleged slave, thus setting him or her free, the judge was entitled to a $5 fee. If the judge ruled for the master, he got a $10 fee. Most northerners viewed this as a blatant attempt to bribe the courts.52

The law needlessly threatened free blacks and unnecessarily trampled on traditional American notions of due process and the fair administration of justice. It was not a bill that could be considered part of a "compromise."

52 The differential payment was based on the fact that commissioners were paid by collecting fees (rather than a salary), and it took much more time to fill out the paperwork necessary to return a fugitive slave than to set a black free. While the different fees made economic sense, they created the appearance that justice was for sale in the North. The payment scale was a public relations disaster for the national government and the Fillmore administration.
because it was so utterly one-sided. In addition to all the denials of due process and the apparent attempt to buy justice, the law made no provisions to protect free people who might be illegally seized under it. There was no antikidnapping provision that would have ameliorated northern sensibilities, and under the Supreme Court’s decision in Prigg v. Pennsylvania, the free states were prohibited from providing any protections for their black residents. Under this law a northern white could be fined, jailed, and sued for helping a black person who he thought was free, but a southerner would face no sanction for seizing a free black and fraudulently or mistakenly claiming him or her as a slave.

The Great Failure and Its Aftermath:
The Spread of Slavery

The compromise measures accomplished little, but they deeply damaged the Union and the credibility of the national government. The territorial accommodation did not satisfy the South, but only whetted slaveholders’ appetite for more land. In 1850 the southerners, with the aid of Senator Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois, had undermined the Missouri Compromise line. In 1854 Douglas introduced the Kansas-Nebraska Act, which repealed the Missouri Compromise line for most of the existing western territories. This was the logical extension of the 1850 compromise. The doughface president Franklin Pierce dutifully signed the law, making slavery legal in all the federal territories except Minnesota and Oregon (which included present-day Washington and parts of Idaho). Slavery was now legal everywhere else in the West. What followed was Bleeding Kansas and the failure of the Pierce and Buchanan administrations to oversee peaceful settlement or fair and democratic elections in Kansas.

In 1857 the Supreme Court finished this task in the Dred Scott case, by striking down the ban on slavery in the Missouri Compromise, and further holding that Congress could never ban slavery in the territories. It is impossible to know if the legislation of 1850 and 1854 emboldened Chief Justice Taney to reach such an extreme result, but this seems likely. This was only the second time the Court had ever found an act of Congress unconstitutional. Striking down an act of Congress seemed counter to Taney’s Jacksonian jurisprudence, but in light of the legislation of 1850 and 1854 the result was consistent with Taney’s general deference to Congress.

Thus the compromise passed in free soil in America. At the beginning of the 1850s, the federal territories, Congress still applied, which made slavery in the West slavery was prohibited by the year Congress had reversed the Missouri Compromise line except California to slavery; it was an expression of decades of American policy by the states of Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, and parts of Colorado, Wyoming, and the remaining territories. In several such public policy had taken place, all laws everywhere. The conflict followed everywhere.

Just as it protected slavery in the northern states, strengthening it in the nation free states, and any public slave markets in Washington, private sales and the sale in the capital. Before 1850 some cities had proposed legislation to gradually end slavery; proposals disappeared. The ban on slavery in the new territories, the debate on the larger issue of slavery in the District of Columbia, and the question of giving something to the North in exchange for the District of Columbia in the district.

The Great Failure and Its Aftermath:
The Fugitive Slave Law

The most important part of the compromise of 1850. Few laws have been so dis- shocked many northerners, who opposed the enforcement of the law stimulated by abolitionists and northern communities. Early opp

---

Thus the compromise passed in 1850 led to a total collapse of the idea of free soil in America. At the beginning of 1850 slavery was banned from almost all the federal territories. Congress had not yet acted on the status of slavery in the newly acquired lands of the Southwest, so presumably Mexican law still applied, which made slavery illegal there.\textsuperscript{31} In almost all of the rest of the West slavery was prohibited by the Missouri Compromise. By the end of the year Congress had reversed the Mexican law, and opened all the new land except California to slavery; by 1854 Congress extended this reversal of decades of American policy by allowing slavery in what would later be the states of Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota, North Dakota, Montana, and parts of Colorado, Wyoming, and Idaho. By 1857 slavery was legal in all the remaining territories. In seven years a gigantic revolution in American public policy had taken place, all under the guise of a compromise between the North and the South. The compromise was that slavery would be allowed everywhere.

Just as it protected slavery in the territories, the Compromise of 1850 strengthened slavery in the nation’s capital. After 1850 there were no longer any public slave markets in Washington, D.C., but that did not limit private sales. Nor did closing the District of Columbia markets harm slavery in the capital. Before 1850 some congressmen, including Abraham Lincoln, had proposed legislation to gradually end slavery there. But after 1850 such proposals disappeared. The ban on the slave trade seems to have shut off debate on the larger issue of slavery in the district. Thus, the law designed to give something to the North had the effect of actually protecting slavery in the district.

The Great Failure and Its Aftermath:
The Fugitive Slave Law

The most important part of the compromise was the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850. Few laws have been so disastrous. The blatant unfairness of the law shocked many northerners, who were otherwise law-abiding citizens. The enforcement of the law stimulated lawless and even violent responses in many northern communities. Early opposition to the law led President Fillmore to ever more vigorous enforcement, as he sought to vindicate his reputation for supporting the law. He also aggressively enforced the law in order to gain southern support for the 1852 Whig nomination. Meanwhile, Secretary of State Webster, equally anxious for the presidential nomination, joined Fillmore in urging vigorous prosecutions of opponents of the law.

\textsuperscript{31}\textsuperscript{William W. Freehling, \textit{The Road to Disunion: Secessionists at Bay, 1776–1854} (New York, 1990), pp. 488–90.}

The law undermined Fillmore's presidency, the Whig Party, and the compromise. Northern opposition to the law stemmed from its absurdly unfair provisions and its failure to protect free blacks from kidnapping or mistakenly being sent to the South as slaves. Also troublesome was the fact that many blacks seized under the law had not recently escaped from bondage but were people who had been away from slavery long enough to establish themselves in northern communities. The first fugitive returned under the law, James Hamlet, had been living in New York City long enough to find steady employment, marry, and have two children. His master saw him as a fugitive slave, but New Yorkers saw him as a neighbor, husband, father, and employee. After he was taken back into bondage, New Yorkers raised $800 to buy his freedom and he was met on his return by an integrated demonstration of four to five thousand people.54

President Fillmore's obsession with enforcing the law, in conjunction with his other actions as president, illustrates the poisonous nature of the law. Fillmore's biographers claim the law "plague[ed] Fillmore's conscience," and that he found it "repugnant." Thus, "he had delayed signing the bill as long as he could."55 But the evidence does not support either argument. During the summer of 1850 Fillmore communicated with Congress about the compromise. As noted above, he sent Congress a detailed, but inconclusive, message about the boundary dispute between Texas and New Mexico. Similarly, throughout his administration Fillmore asked Congress to pass legislation on all sorts of things, from building lighthouses on the Great Lakes to establishing a new mint in San Francisco. But in the summer of 1850 Fillmore never once suggested that the fugitive slave bill needed to be altered to guarantee due process. After Clay's Omnibus Bill failed, Fillmore "intensified his intervention in Congress's legislation and he was "adamant about passing it." He truly had doubts about its constitutionality, but he wouldn't be bothered by signing a law that would give the law enforcement a chance to do its job—"it is surprising how the process of communication to Congress. If he had opposed any of its provisions, we have no evidence either.

Nor is there evidence that he "spoke as long as he could." The fugitive slave bill was sent to the Senate without any input from Fillmore. The Senate passed it, still without any input or consideration, back to the Senate. On September 10, 1850, reported that bill had been delivered to the Senate on the 15th.55

Did this bill plague Fillmore's conscience? More than a month after its passage, Webster "the law, having been prudently asserted that "so far as it protects labor it is according to the requirements of the case and the men who had any pangs of conscience even arbitrary about a law that did so much as to whether he should be compelled, subject to some other state to be claimed as a fugitive slave and undermine the liberty of the tens of thousands including the nearly fifty thousand in San Francisco. He saw nothing wrong, or even possibly to the court. He was only willing to concede the liberty, and he would not ever, he would soon reject even the..."
He sought to vindicate his reputation by aggressively enforcing the law in order to bolster his nomination. Meanwhile, Secretary Webster, the presidential candidate, joined other opponents of the law.

Enforcing the law, in conjunction with the poisonous nature of the law, plague[d] Fillmore’s conscience, he had delayed signing the bill as long as possible. He communicated with Congress about the law and its consequences, but in conclusion between Texas and New Mexico. Fillmore asked Congress to pass a fugitive slave bill in order to make law known and enforce it.

The fugitive slave bill needed to be altered. Fillmore “intended his intervention in Congress’s proceedings” to secure the compromise and he was “adamant about passing ... the fugitive slave measure.” If he truly had doubts about its constitutionality—if he knew his “conscience” would be bothered by signing a law that was so arbitrary and such an affront to due process—it is surprising he did not mention these concerns in some communication to Congress. If he was bothered by the fugitive slave law, or any of its provisions, we have no evidence of it.

Nor is there evidence that he “hesitated” or “delayed signing the bill as long as he could.” The fugitive slave bill passed on the Senate on August 26, without any input from Fillmore. On September 12, the House passed the bill, still without any input or communication from Fillmore, and sent it back to the Senate. On September 16, the presiding officer of the Senate reported that bill had been delivered to the president, who signed it on the eighteenth.

Did this bill plague Fillmore’s conscience? The evidence suggests otherwise. More than a month after its passage, Fillmore told Secretary of State Webster “that the law, having been passed, must be executed.” He emphatically asserted that “so far as it provides for the surrender of fugitives from labor it is according to the requirements of the Constitution and should be sustained against all attempts at repeal.” This was hardly the voice of a man who had any pangs of conscience. He saw nothing unconstitutional or even arbitrary about a law that did not allow a man to speak in his own defense as to whether he should be dragged away from where he was living to some other state to be claimed as a slave. He did not even see how this might undermine the liberty of the tens of thousands of free blacks in the North, including the nearly fifty thousand who lived in his home state of New York. He saw nothing wrong, or even politically unwise, in paying commissioners twice as much money for sending a man to slavery as sending him to freedom. He was only willing to concede that “if there” was a provision that endangered liberty, he would not object to changing the law. In fact, however, he would soon reject even this possibility.

While Fillmore's biographers claim he was troubled by the law, he enforced it more vigorously than any other federal law on the books. The administration's treatment of filibusters underscores Fillmore's almost fanatical attempts to support the fugitive slave law and prosecute those who refused to help enforce it or actually violated its provisions.

During Fillmore's administration a small army of about four hundred men, led by the notorious filibuster Narciso López, a Venezuelan, sailed from New Orleans to Cuba, where they hoped to seize that Spanish colony. This filibustering expedition violated American and international law and could have forced the United States into a war with Spain. In April 1851 Fillmore issued an official proclamation condemning filibustering expeditions as "wicked schemes," warning that participants in such "adventures for plunder and robbery," would "subject themselves to heavy penalties" of up to $3,000 in fines and three years in prison, and would "forfeit their claim to the protection of this Government."59 But when López's army sailed for Cuba in August, Fillmore did nothing to stop the invasion force. When these soldiers of fortune were captured and brought to Spain for trial, Fillmore negotiated for their return—at government expense—to the United States. Despite this brazen violation of American law, as well as the president's proclamation against filibustering, Fillmore did not seek any indictments of these lawbreakers. This of course sharply contrasts with Fillmore's response to those who opposed the fugitive slave law.60

In his last two years in office Fillmore would expend enormous energy overseeing the enforcement of the fugitive slave law. At no time would he express any doubts about the constitutionality of the law. Privately Fillmore told Webster, "God knows that I detest Slavery."61 Perhaps the Almighty did know that Fillmore secretly detested slavery, but no human being would have seen this in his policies, his speeches, or the acts of his administration. He told Webster slavery was "an existing evil, for which we are not responsible, and we must endure it,"62 but in fact he was more than willing to endure and protect it. His notion of compromise was to give everything to slavery and not even blink at the act's fundamentality, or the way it threatened all notions of freedom.

Throughout 1851 and 1852 Fillmore resolutely enforced the fugitive slave law. When the Johnson-Douglas dispute led to a sectional crisis over the territories of Kansas and Oregon, and when Fillmore and several Democratic senators blocked the admission of free states to the Union, Fillmore's administration was drawn into the sectional conflict. In the heated debate over the Kansas-Nebraska Act, Fillmore refused to support the phony compromise he had helped draft. When the act became law, the president refused to defend it in Congress or to enforce it. But when John Brown arrived in Kansas, Fillmore did not offer any meaningful assistance to defend the law, nor did he attack Brown or his followers. The president's response to the Kansas-Nebraska Act was, in the words of a contemporaneous observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation,"63 and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

As the conflict over the Kansas-Nebraska Act edged toward civil war in 1852, Fillmore's administration, like that of his predecessors, sought to avoid the need for military force by offering to mediate the sectional dispute. But Fillmore's administration was not the only one involved in mediation efforts. In September 1852, Lincoln offered to mediate the dispute, but Fillmore's administration rejected the offer. In the end, Fillmore's administration did not even try to mediate the sectional crisis. The president's response was, in the words of a contemporary observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

Fillmore's administration was not the only one involved in mediation efforts. In September 1852, Lincoln offered to mediate the dispute, but Fillmore's administration rejected the offer. The president's response was, in the words of a contemporary observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

Throughout 1851 and 1852 Fillmore resolutely enforced the fugitive slave law. When the Johnson-Douglas dispute led to a sectional crisis over the territories of Kansas and Oregon, and when Fillmore and several Democratic senators blocked the admission of free states to the Union, Fillmore's administration was drawn into the sectional conflict. In the heated debate over the Kansas-Nebraska Act, Fillmore refused to support the phony compromise he had helped draft. When the act became law, the president refused to defend it in Congress or to enforce it. But when John Brown arrived in Kansas, Fillmore did not offer any meaningful assistance to defend the law, nor did he attack Brown or his followers. The president's response to the Kansas-Nebraska Act was, in the words of a contemporaneous observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

As the conflict over the Kansas-Nebraska Act edged toward civil war in 1852, Fillmore's administration, like that of his predecessors, sought to avoid the need for military force by offering to mediate the sectional dispute. But Fillmore's administration was not the only one involved in mediation efforts. In September 1852, Lincoln offered to mediate the dispute, but Fillmore's administration rejected the offer. In the end, Fillmore's administration did not even try to mediate the sectional crisis. The president's response was, in the words of a contemporary observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

Fillmore's administration was not the only one involved in mediation efforts. In September 1852, Lincoln offered to mediate the dispute, but Fillmore's administration rejected the offer. The president's response was, in the words of a contemporaneous observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

Overall, the success of the 1850s was underscored by the fact that Fillmore was largely able to govern without much resistance. Fillmore, Webster, Clay, and other leading politicians did not expect a precedent-setting conflict; instead, they hoped for a peaceful resolution to the sectional crisis. But when John Brown arrived in Kansas, Fillmore did not offer any meaningful assistance to defend the law, nor did he attack Brown or his followers. The president's response was, in the words of a contemporaneous observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

In the end, Fillmore's administration was not the only one involved in mediation efforts. In September 1852, Lincoln offered to mediate the dispute, but Fillmore's administration rejected the offer. The president's response was, in the words of a contemporaneous observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

Overall, the success of the 1850s was underscored by the fact that Fillmore was largely able to govern without much resistance. Fillmore, Webster, Clay, and other leading politicians did not expect a precedent-setting conflict; instead, they hoped for a peaceful resolution to the sectional crisis. But when John Brown arrived in Kansas, Fillmore did not offer any meaningful assistance to defend the law, nor did he attack Brown or his followers. The president's response was, in the words of a contemporaneous observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

In the end, Fillmore's administration was not the only one involved in mediation efforts. In September 1852, Lincoln offered to mediate the dispute, but Fillmore's administration rejected the offer. The president's response was, in the words of a contemporaneous observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

In the end, Fillmore's administration was not the only one involved in mediation efforts. In September 1852, Lincoln offered to mediate the dispute, but Fillmore's administration rejected the offer. The president's response was, in the words of a contemporaneous observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

In the end, Fillmore's administration was not the only one involved in mediation efforts. In September 1852, Lincoln offered to mediate the dispute, but Fillmore's administration rejected the offer. The president's response was, in the words of a contemporaneous observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

In the end, Fillmore's administration was not the only one involved in mediation efforts. In September 1852, Lincoln offered to mediate the dispute, but Fillmore's administration rejected the offer. The president's response was, in the words of a contemporaneous observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

In the end, Fillmore's administration was not the only one involved in mediation efforts. In September 1852, Lincoln offered to mediate the dispute, but Fillmore's administration rejected the offer. The president's response was, in the words of a contemporaneous observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

In the end, Fillmore's administration was not the only one involved in mediation efforts. In September 1852, Lincoln offered to mediate the dispute, but Fillmore's administration rejected the offer. The president's response was, in the words of a contemporaneous observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

In the end, Fillmore's administration was not the only one involved in mediation efforts. In September 1852, Lincoln offered to mediate the dispute, but Fillmore's administration rejected the offer. The president's response was, in the words of a contemporaneous observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

In the end, Fillmore's administration was not the only one involved in mediation efforts. In September 1852, Lincoln offered to mediate the dispute, but Fillmore's administration rejected the offer. The president's response was, in the words of a contemporaneous observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

In the end, Fillmore's administration was not the only one involved in mediation efforts. In September 1852, Lincoln offered to mediate the dispute, but Fillmore's administration rejected the offer. The president's response was, in the words of a contemporaneous observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.

In the end, Fillmore's administration was not the only one involved in mediation efforts. In September 1852, Lincoln offered to mediate the dispute, but Fillmore's administration rejected the offer. The president's response was, in the words of a contemporaneous observer, "a virtual admission of his own error in drafting the legislation," and a tacit admission of guilt for his role in contributing to the sectional crisis.
he was troubled by the law, he entered federal law on the books. The ad nerscores Fillmore's almost fanatical commitment and prosecute those who refused to accept provisions.
small army of about four hundred soldiers, led by Narciso López, a Venezuelan, sailed to hero and was expected to seize that Spanish colony. American and international law and say to a war with Spain. In April 1851, the U.S. government ordered Fillmore to commit by condemning filibustering expeditions. The participants in such "adventures put themselves to heavy penalties" of prison, and would "forfeit their claim to indemnification." But when López's army sailed for the U.S. Attorney General, Fillmore ordered the U.S. attorney to charge the conspirators with men, all of whom had been bystanders in the event, with treason for failing to help the U.S. marshal seize a runaway slave. This led to the largest treason trial in American history, but no convictions. Supreme Court Justice Robert Grier, who was a doughface Democrat and no friend of abolitionists, nevertheless ruled that refusing to help enforce the fugitive slave law, or even resisting its enforcement, was not treason. Rescues and attempted rescues in Syracuse and Boston also led to seemingly endless trials, but only one conviction, and that defendant died of natural causes while his case was on appeal.

Overall, the success of the 1850 law was at best mixed. Between 1850 and 1861 about a thousand blacks would be returned to bondage under the law. Since southerners estimated that more than ten thousand escaped in that time—and many more were already in the North—the law hardly gave the South what it needed. The decade was punctuated by rescues and other kinds of resistance. Fillmore, Webster, Clay, and the others who supported the law never expected white northerners to break the law to protect black freedom, which happened sporadically throughout the decade. In trials northern juries often refused to convict men charged with interfering with the law.

Southerners, and their northern allies in Congress, probably assumed that blacks were irrelevant to the political equation. Doubtless their own racist assumptions made them believe that blacks were not "manly" enough to fight for their own liberty. But they were wrong. In Boston blacks rushed the courthouse to rescue Shadrach Minkins from a U.S. marshal. In rural Pennsylvania, fugitive slaves fought for their freedom, killing a master at Christiana. In Syracuse blacks and whites teamed up to rescue the fugitive slave Jerry from federal custody. Throughout the North, blacks, sometimes with white allies, sometimes not, organized self-defense groups. These events, along with resistance organized by blacks and their white friends throughout the North, horrified Fillmore, who saw them as a violation of the fundamental principles of the Constitution. He told Webster, "I mean at every sacrifice and at every hazard to perform my duty." He grandly declared, "Nullification can not and will not be tolerated." But from the perspective of American blacks and many whites, it was absurd to believe that a person who escaped from bondage should peacefully return to slavery. If this was a "nullification" of the Constitution, it was nevertheless an implementation of the Declaration of Independence.

While President Fillmore insisted he would enforce the law at all costs, Frederick Douglass suggested that the best way to deal with the new law was "to make a dozen or more dead kidnappers." In fact, there were only a few dead slave catchers—one at Christiana in 1851, another in Boston during a failed attempt to rescue Anthony Burns in 1854. But they were enough to terrify Fillmore and two subsequent administrations and help derail the compromise.

Most arrests under the law did not lead to confrontations of violence, but enough did to embarrass every administration for the rest of the decade and lead southerners to conclude that nowhere in the North could they expect to vindicate their claims to fugitive slaves. Northerners who were otherwise law abiding and peaceful suddenly found themselves helping rescue slaves from federal marshals or voting to acquit those who did.

Meanwhile the law stimulated Harriet Beecher Stowe to write Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852), the most politically powerful text since Thomas Paine's Common Sense and the greatest best seller of the century. Stowe's book was a powerful indictment of slavery and the fugitive slave law, and provided a cultural defense of those who protected fugitives and sent them on their way to Canada.

The Fugitive Slave Law of 1850 did not lead to a wholesale breakdown of law and order. But this law, which turned out to be the central component of the compromise, was so unfair, so one-sided, so outrageous, that it could not possibly work. It left southerners arrogantly believing they could demand anything from the supine North; northerners proved to be less so.

In the end, the compromise failed. It gave almost everything to slaves, and was only a tangible gain for the North which was a foregone conclusion. The compromise was their only solution. That's why Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, Stephen Douglas and the others planted in 1850.

---

63Ibid.
and win anything from the supine North; it then left them furious when average northern citizens proved to be less pliant.

In the end, the compromise failed because it was never a compromise at all. It gave almost everything to slavery and almost nothing to freedom. The only tangible gain for the North was the free state of California, and that was a foregone conclusion. The compromise left southerners arrogant and then angry when their legislative victory turned out to be a mirage. They demanded more, and more, and still it was never enough. In the end, secession was their only solution. That was the fruit of the “compromise” that Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, Stephen A. Douglas, and Millard Fillmore planted in 1850.

...